THE KING OF COREA.

Never Been Sixteen Miles From His Capital.

HE LIVES IN A FINE LARGE PALACE.

Possessed of a Wide-awake Wife—Ratifies Revolutions, and so Preserves His Royal Status Quo.

Many travelers now on their way to China and the East were so fortunate as to meet in Yokohoma a man of note in Europe who had recently been in Corea and observed the life of the King of that unfortunate country. He met the monarch several times, and they became interested in one another. From the King, and from many well-informed residents of Seoul, he learned a great deal about the routine in the royal palace. The King is an intelligent little man of about 41 years of age, who reads nothing but Chinese, but is constantly endeavoring to learn all that he can by hearsay of what is going on in the world beyond his own domain. By questioning every diplomat and traveler who comes in his way he has become so generally well informed as to give the impression that he knows more than any one would imagine could possibly have been acquired by such a monarch situated as he is.

He is a short man, of what we would call boyish height and figure. Seen in his audience hall he looks ridiculously small and insignificant. This is especially the case because the audience room is an immense one, and the King is always first seen alone, at the far end of it, its only occupant except the little table beside which he always stands when holding a levee or granting an audience. The gentleman who gave me these facts about him says that when he was first presented to the King, he was walking, erect and unabashed, into the great chamber along with many nobles and courtiers, who were advancing with bent heads and outstretched arms. Suddenly my informant stumbled and all but turned a somersault over the man in front of him. That man and all the others had, without warning, flung themselves upon their knees, in readiness to bump their heads the requisite number of times upon the floor before his Majesty. The action was so swift and silent that it was a wonder the European did not make a leap-frog jump into the royal presence. An interpreter was provided, and to him the King spoke. The King and the European were the only persons present who held up their heads. All the Coreans held their heads at right angles with their bodies, and looked fixedly at the floor.

In that attitude the interpreter heard all that the King said and translated it to the European, translating back again whatsoever was said in reply. It was interesting to note the intelligence behind all his questions, and then to reflect that of actual knowledge of the world the King has less than a child of a dozen years at home. In all his life he has never been further from Seoul than fifteen miles—a distance traversed once when he went to certain tomb s of his ancestors. He spends his life in his palace and the grounds or garden that adjoins it. Five times a year it is his custom and duty to visit certain temples in the city of Seoul in order to celebrate religious festivals. These are the only breaches in the monotony of his elegant imprisonment in his palace.

On such occasions the King fancies that he sees his capital, but he does not. He is of the opinion that he knows Seoul as well as his courtiers know it, whereas, in fact, he knows nothing of it except as it is prepared for him on those especial days. The city is a very large one, having a wall of eighteen to twenty miles in length. It contains half a million souls. Of all this he has seen but one street—the main road that runs across the city. This street or avenue is sixty yards wide, and is the only wide, presentable thoroughfare in Seoul. Across and out of it run hundreds of little, narrow, dirty lanes that form a labyrinthian network of filthy thoroughfares, solidly walled with tenements, and swarming with people. Of these the King knows nothing. Before he traverses the broad main highway it is all cleared and swept and garnished for his coming, so that he does not even know what that street is really like. On all other days it is reduced to a width of about twenty feet, all the rest of its great width being filled with a clutter of stalls and booths and stands, which the soldiery clear away whenever the King is to make a royal progress to a temple.

The ancient glory of his out-of-door appearance has been greatly diminished within the past five years by the Europeanization, if one may call it so, of his army. The soldiers now dress in sensible and practical uniforms. But even to-day a royal procession in Seoul is by far the most extraordinary spectacle of the kind to be seen on the face of the earth. "Barnum's grand parade is nothing in comparison," says my informant, "and the Lord Mayor's pageant in London is paltry beside it." In the King's company are trumpeters and musicians, ancient bowmen in the queerest and most preposterous uniforms, banners, masks, fan-bearers, gorgeous noblemen, and all the rest that goes to make up the most splendid and fantastic Oriental pageantry.

He moves about with a force of at least 2,000 men, and they include every sort of functionary known to an Eastern potentate. His Majesty himself is adorned beyond the lilies in magnificence. He wears robes of purple ablaze with gold, both before and behind. He wears an extraordinary hat and is seated in a splendid chair that is carried by sixty gorgeously clad bearers. He is sheltered by a magnificent awning or canopy of purple and gold. Strangely enough, his subjects do not prostrate themselves before him, as the subjects of the Chinese Emperor do. They stand erect and look at him and his pageant stolidly and with that silence that so strangely marks the behavior of all such crowds in the Orient.

The King lives in a fine large palace in Seoul, with his Queen and 600 or 700 women, the greater number of whom are, nominally at least, his wives. The Queen is his constant companion and has ever been firmly resolved not to share her place or dignity with any other woman. She next to never leaves his side—never, it is said, without knowing where he is going and what takes him away. She is not merely his companion, but his keeper; his sole wife, despite the great number of other wives that custom declares should be his to command. It happens now and then that the King shows some interest in some other woman, or is suspected of having visited one of the Queens' satellites. Invariably in such a case the new favorite dies or flees the palace. Quite recently, it is said, the Queen was merciful to a beautiful and clever woman in the palace, and allowed her to leave the royal service and make her home elsewhere in Seoul. The King wrote to this woman, and received letters from her. Still, the Queen—whom nothing escapes—was merciful to the woman. She merely caused the man who carried the letters to and for to be beheaded. He was an old and faithful court attendant. He was publicly executed. She is as truly King or sovereign in the palace as her husband is King elsewhere in Corea. All who are in the palace—men and women both—are her appointees. They owe to her, and understand that it is far more safe to disobey or even to anger the King than to show disrespect to her. They carry all the gossip of the palace to her, and nothing can happen within those walls without her being quickly informed of it.

The King does not go to bed at night. He stays up all night and sleeps in the daytime. At night he and the Queen sit together, whiling the hours away by smoking tiny golden pipes of Chinese tobacco, a pealike pellet at a time. His owl-like life is a source of annoyance to the diplomats and other Europeans who have to do with him. It must be a dreadful trial to the courtiers who are obliged to attend the King's call at the most unheard of and smallest hours of the night. He summons the diplomatic corps to meet him at 9 o'clock or 10 o'clock at night, and often when these big wigs reach the place, suffocating in their padded liveries, they are told the King is dozing, and they must wait for him to wake up. It would cost a man his head to wake the monarch. Champagne and cigars are sent out to his visitors, but no one cares to drink champagne steadily, for two or three hours as a preliminary to a formal interview with a King. When at last he does awake and move toward the audience hall his attendants rush before, bent double, and uttering a strange, pathetic cry. "Hoo-oo-oo! Hoo-oo-oo!" they moan as they move along, and as each new man in the halls or corridors hears the cry he too utters it, until the whole atmosphere of the palace quivers with the mournful din of this birdlike yet soft and lugubrious refrain. This is always the case, by day and by night. Whenever and wherever the King goes his servants make this queer, uncanny noise.

The King turns night into day because he is afraid of a revolution. He has experienced many in his time—three or four in the last half dozen years. One would suppose that when, at 8 o'clock each night, the ponderous gates in the walls of Seoul are closed and locked and the massive old keys of the gates are brought to the palace, the King would order the palace closed and go to sleep serenely. But he knows better. He knows that conspirators are forever without the palace walls endeavoring to get in and overturn the government. He knows that they select the night time for their revolutions. To be sure, they mean him no disrespect and no harm, and, moreover, the state officials within the palace are as watchful and alert to keep the conspirators out as the conspirators are to enter. Yet the King does not feel easy. He dislikes a revolution on account of the injury to his dignity, the disturbance of his plans, and the general bother that it puts him to. When the revolutionists make their way into the palace they immediately behead the officers of the government they have upset.

They seek the presence of the King, prepared with a number of decrees providing whatever changes in the laws and government they most desire. To save trouble, and because there is really nothing to do, the King signs and seals these decrees as fast as they are offered to him. The first one he signs always provides for the beheading of the men who have already been beheaded. Thus the conspirators legalize what they have done. In their ready-made decrees the King declares that the dead officers are traitors, and should be killed. Thus a constitutional, orderly form of government is preserved.

How the King sleeps when he retires in the daytime I have not heard, but there is a true story of a time when he tried to sleep and could not—for a very funny reason. He has as many and as expensive whims as any monarch, and, like any monarch, he is anxious to gratify as many of them as possible. Not long ago he thought he would like to live in a European house, and, as far as possible, after the European fashion. A house was built for him within the palace grounds, and he suffered the customary Asiatic "squeezing that made the building cost him about twelve times what it cost those who built it. Finished, it was next furnished in European style. At the King's express command his bedroom was fitted with a bureau and washstand, chairs and rocking-chairs, and a bed that was completed with pillows, bolster, and linen sheets, all of which are things unknown to the Coreans. The King went in to take possession of his house. It was during cold weather. He undressed and popped into bed. He instantly popped out again and sounded a yell as he did so. He had his attendants throw a blanket around him and he fled from the house, never to enter it again. The reason was that Coreans go to bed unclad, and when the King's bare flesh went between the cold linen sheets he got a shock so great that the memory of it frightens him to this day.—Julian Ralph's Letter in Harper's Weekly.

HORSES IN ARGENTINA.

The Argentine Republic has lately issued a pamphlet entitled, "The Horse, the Ass and the Mule." It contains a great deal of information about the horse of that country. The Argentine Republic occupies the third place in the world so far as the breeding of horses is concerned. Russia comes first, while the United States holds second place, says the New York "Sun."

The horse has been an important factor in the civilazation of the South American people, as it formerly constituted their chief means of transportation. All journeys were made on horseback, several remounts being made by each rider. Only when heavy and bulky merchandise had to be carried did the people use carts drawn by oxen. They also used pack mules.

Fifty years ago horses lived in a wild state and managed to draw away to their wild life small herds of domesticated animals. They had increased in a most extraordinary manner. The country was not very prosperous at that time, whole ranches were abandoned by their owners and on some deserted cattle farms there were as many as 50,000 head of wild horses. At present most of the herds are domesticated.

The common breed of horse in the republic are called crivollos. They were the original breed, but of late years breeders have been crossing them with imported stock from England and this country. The horses are of fair size, from 14 to 15 hands high.

They are strong and healthy animals, possessing great power of endurance. They don't require much food, as they are content with the pasture they find in the fields. In the country districts, owing to the sandy nature of the soil, the horses are never shod.

In the province of Montes Grandes the horses are famous for their size. They are bigger and stronger than the ordinary crivollos. By the last census there were 4,262,917 horses in the Argentine Republic.

ART IN THE OCCIDENT.

The following is said to be a verbatim account of the introduction of an eminent violinist to a far-western audience, says "Harper's Magazine:"

"Ladies and gentlemen," began Col. Handy Polk, the well-known real-estate agent, stepping to the front of the stage and addressing the audience, "it is my privilege this evening to introduce to you Sig.——, the notorious furrin fiddler, who will endeavor to favor us with some high-class and A No. 1 violin playin." The signor was born and raised in Italy, where fiddlin' is not merely a fad, but as much of a business as politics is in this country, and when it comes to handlin' the bow he emphatically knows whur he is at.

He hasn't dropped into our midst by accident, but comes under the auspices of the Literary society, which is payin' his wages and backin' him to the last gasp. So let it be understood that if you happen to have any criticisms to offer you are to do your kickin' to the society and not to the signor. I'll jest add that if you expect him to swing the fiddle around his head or play it under his leg like we used to skip stones across the swimmin' hole when we were boys and girls, you may just as well go right now and git your money back from the doorkeeper, for the signor hain't that kind of a player. That's all I have to say at present. Start her up, signor."

PROGRESSIVE WOMAN.

The degrees of bachelor of medicine and of master in surgery have this year, for the first time in the history of the Scottish universities, been conferred on women. One of these young women, who ranked third in a class of sixty-one members, stood first in her class of zoology, practical chemistry, anatomy, history, physiology, surgry, medicine, pathology and midwifery. Her clinical work was done in the Royal Hospital for sick children and in the Royal Infirmary. The other young woman who received a degree, and who has done excellent work during her seven years' college course, will act as medical assistant to her father, who is a Glasgow physician.

HOW A LAWYER COLLECTED A BAD BILL.

Ephraim Flint, the veteran lawyer of Dover, Maine, who died recently, was once fined by a country Justice of the Peace for contempt of court in telling the Magistrate too bluntly what he thought of one of his decisions. Mr. Flint was not taken back by the Justice's order to his clerk. "All right," he said, "I have got a note in my pocket against you which I have been trying to collect for the last ten years, and I'll indorse the fine on it. I never expected to get that much," and, suiting the action to the words, he pulled out the note and made the indorsement.

The share of land falling to each inhabitant of the globe, in the event of a partition, might be set down at twenty-three and one-half acres.

POWERFUL CONDOR.

A Traveler's Experience with the Fierce Bird.

AT THE FOOTHILLS OF THE ANDES.

Horses, Bullocks, and South American Lions Killed and Eaten by these Big Birds.

Mr. Arthur Baird recently returned from South America to New York. He had a remarkable experience in hunting condors which he related to a correspondent of the St. Louis "Globe-Democrat:"

"It was a long and tiresome journey inland to the foot of the Andes, where, I had been told, I might be able to get a shot at a condor. During the trip my guide and the native hunters who accompanied me told me so many wonderful stories of the condor that I was beginning to believe that the bird was a myth and existed only in the imagination of my companions.

"One of the things they told me about condors was that the birds would attack any kind of animal that was wounded or crippled and make short work of it. They told me stories of horses, bullocks, and even full-grown pumas, or South American lions, that had been killed and eaten by the big birds.

"After two days of the hardest climbing I ever did we crossed what I was told was one of the foothills of the Andes, but what seemed to me a mountain about as high as the Rockies. On the other side of this range there was a narrow valley, through which flowed a small river that was fed by the snows on the peaks of the real mountains. Beyond this valley was the base of the giant Andes, on the summit of which I was told the condors lived. It was to this valley they came in search of prey. There had once been plenty of wild game along both banks of the river, but most of it had been killed or driven away by the big birds, and it was then unsafe for a domestic animal of any kind to be at large during the day, and even men were sometimes attacked.

"We had been two days in the valley without catching sight of one of the birds, and I was getting discouraged. On the morning of the third day a small party of pack traders passed our camp, bound down the valley. From them we learned that they had abandoned one of their pack horses about a mile up the trail. The animal had a sore back, and had become so lame it was of no further service. 'The condors will make a meal of that horse, said my guide. He had scarcely spoken when, looking away toward the tallest peak of the Andes, I saw what looked like a black speck in the sky. In a moment there was another of the black specks, and then another and another, until I could make out a score of giant birds sailing majestically down toward the valley.

"'They are coming!' said the guide, as soon as he caught sight of them, and gathering up our guns we hurried up the trail to find the abandoned horse.

"I suggested that we approach cautiously for fear the birds would see us and be frightened away. But there I exposed my ignorance of the condor.

"'Take care that you are not the one to be frightened away!' said one of my companions.

"We soon caught sight of the horse, which was slowly following along the trail. In less time than it takes to tell it the score of condors were circling around above the doomed animal and not more than a thousand feet high. The first time their shadows fell across the trail the poor old horse threw up his head and, catching sight of the black cloud above him, gave a snort of terror.

"He wheeled about and tried to run toward the river, which was close at hand, but was too lame to make much progress. The birds were still flying around in a small circle, but every moment they were getting nearer the earth. We stood still and watched them.

"When they were within 500 feet of the earth they suddenly shot downward like a black cloud of doom. The whir of their giant wings was like the roar of an approaching storm. It was a sight never to be forgotten.

"As the condors swooped down the poor horse uttered a scream of terror, the like of which I never want to hear again. It was like the cry of a human being in mortal agony of terror. For a minute the animal was almost obscured from our view by the big birds circling around him, and then his snorts of terror were changed to wails of pain. "The horse was now running around in a short circle, and making the best fight he could aginst his assailants. As he came closer to where we stood I saw that his eyes had already been torn from their sockets by the long beaks of the condors. They had torn his flesh in a dozen places with their sharp talons, and blood was streaming down the sides of the helpless animal.

"Up to the time that they beagn to strike their victim with beak and claw the birds had made no sound. But now, with the smell of blood whett in their appetites, they began to give voice to short horse cries that were the most hideous noise to which I ever listened.

"I had for the moment forgotten that I carried a repeating rifle. The horrible fascination of the scene had completely overpowered me, but as the pitiful cries of the doomed horse grew weaker and his fight against the terrible odds had weakened to a kick my senses came back to me.

"I raised my rifle and was taking careful aim at the nearest condor when the guide caught me by the arm. His face was drawn with the terror and excitement of the scene.

"'Wait,' said he. 'Don't disturb them now, or they may turn on us, and then we will have a fight for our lives.'

"In an instant I realized what a hopeless fight that would be if all those giant birds should attack us as they had the horse, and I put down my gun.

"But the fight with the horse was soon over. With the flesh hanging in shreds from his sides, neck, and haunches, the poor animal sank to his knees, then rolled over on his side, dead. In a moment the whole swarm of the great birds were around the body, tearing the bleeding flesh from the bones in strips with their beaks and swallowing it without an effort.

"In less than five minutes, it seemed to me, every bit of flesh had been torn from the bones of the dead horse and eaten. The skeleton was torn apart, and the blood-stained bones scattered about on the ground.

"Then, one by one, the condors began to fly away. With a great flapping of wings and uttering hoarse cries they rose slowly at first and, circling around until they were at least 1,000 feet above the earth, they sailed away toward the distant peaks of the Andes.

"Not until more than half of them had flown away did the guide give the signal to open fire. All this time the birds had apparently taken no notice of us, although we were in plain view less than fifty yards from where the horse fell.

"We all began shooting at once at the few condors that were still pecking at the bones of the dead horse. Talk about a cat having nine lives, there is nothing that walks or flies so hard to kill with powder and lead as a condor. I am sure that I sent three bullets through the body of one of them, and then the big bird flew away to his mountain home as if nothing had happened.

"For a time it looked as if we would be unable to kill one of them. But all four of us finally opened fire on the same bird, a big one still on the ground. After we had fired one volley it rose slowly some fifty feet above the ground. Then we fired again and it fell, but it was still alive when we came up, and not until the guide had cut off its head did it cease to struggle.

"When we examined the dead bird we found that five rifle balls had passed through its body, and that one wing and both legs were broken by our shots. We must have hit four or five others, but they were all able to get away except the one on which we had concentrated our fire.

"The dead condor measured nearly fourteen feet from tip to tip of its wings.

"After that experience I was ready to believe almost any story I heard of these giant birds of the Andes."

THE OLD MORAVIAN INN.

In that quaint old caravansary, the old Moravian inn, at Bethlehem, in Pennsylvania, among many other old-time prints there is a "View of the City of Boston, the Capital of New England, in North America, 1761." Alongside of it, as though placed there as a foil to the benefit of Boston, is an old print of "A View of Bethlehem, the Great Moravian Settlement in the Province of Pennsylvania, 1761. Although completely transformed to the demands of modern patronage, the old Sun inn, well remembered by old-time Boston merchants, still stands as part and parcel of the first house of entertainment built by the Moravian brethren (the unitas fratum) within the limits of their earliest settlement in the province of Pennsylvania, says the "Boston Traveller."

In the office, reading-room and parlors of this old inn there are more rare engravings than in any similar place in America. But the most interesting features of the ancient hostelry are the old account books, so clearly and faithfully kept by the representatives of the first co-operative association in America. These records show that, despite the highly religious zeal of the Moravian brethren, the greatest and most successful of missionaries among the Indians, the temperance idea did not prevail among them. On July 4, 1801, I found a record on a recent visit there of the arrival of "a gentleman in the stage. One glass of punch." On July 8 the same year, appears the following:

"A company in a stage with four horses and driver. Eight breakfasts, eight dinners, sixteen suppers, one gin spirits, one bottle porter, two pints porter, two pints port, £2.18.1." No occasion for a cash register in those days.

In the same year there are many interesting entries, among them the arrival of a party of strolling players, of whom the clerk says: "Aug. 28—A company of actors. Twelve suppers, twelve breakfasts, nine dinners, twelve gills of brandy." The most interesting item notes the arrival, on Nov. 28, of Gen. Lee, the marplot of the revolution, Charles Lee. This was two years before his lonely death in Philadelphia.

The letter-writer adventurer appears to have been in robust health then, for besides his dinner he got away with "one bottle of Madeira, five quarts of beer and five and a quarter pints of brandy." Those old fellows were lusty, hearty men.

AN UNPOPULAR BRIDEGROOM.

A correspondent telegraphs: An extraordinary scene was witnessed at a Cheshire wedding yesterday. The bridegroom was received with groans and hisses and a running fire of abuse was kept up throughout the ceremony by a party of ladies from Winsford. Their hostility seemed to arise from the notion that the bridegroom was marrying the wrong girl. On leaving the church he was mobbed, his hat being knocked off, his face scratched and coat torn. The bridegroom was at length rescued by the bride and escaped in a gig.—London Telegraph.

MODERN SCIENCE.

Horrors Disclosed by the Use of the Microscope.

MUCH TRUTH EVOLVED BY SCIENCE.

Years Ago People Lived in Calm Confidence that Whatever Is, Is Right.

Modern science has made many a wonderful discovery, but unfortunately not all of its discoveries are welcome. It has revealed the beautiful processes of nature, but it has also revealed her destroying agencies. The more closely man has studied, the more complicated has he found conditions and the more dangers has he recognized. Where all is outwardly lovely, he has found inward harm. The microscope has disclosed minute horrors, none the less horrible because minute. The telescope, as it sweeps the heavens with its far-seeing eye, has foretold stupendous catastrophes. Much that was thought beneficial has been proved dangerous, and much that was thought harmless has been proved fatal. It has been demonstrated that hand in hand with benefits stalk injuries. Great good is always attended by satellites of little evils.

Years ago people lived in calm confidence that whatever is, is rigth. They had faith in all things. To-day people have faith in nothing. They are like pilgrims walking through the valley of the shadow of death, feeling thick about them horrors they could not see. They have learned that the very air, once considered a life-giving nectar, is peopled with ferocious microbes seeking whom they may devour. They imagine their insiduous enemies perched on restaurant chairs, sitting a tilt on the passing coin, flying from shoulder to shoulder in the jostling crowd. They have learned that the water they drink swarms with life and carries germs of dread disease. They have learned that one article of food is bad for the nerves, another heats the blood, another is hard to digest, and so on through all known menus. They have learned that imperfect sanitation and ventilation endanger health, and that proper conditions are, moreover, very rarely attained. Nor is it in everyday affairs alone that science has pointed out the dangers that await man. Through all the realm of human interests it has conjured up evils. Its warning cry runs the gamut of calamities from the danger of not exercising enough up to the danger of the race multiplying too fast for the earth to support it and the equally dramatic danger of the earth flying from its orbit and rushing into the warm embrace of the sun.

Sensitive souls are reduced to a state of abject terror when they think of the small chance man has of life, health, and prosperity, in the face of these ogres of science. What shall they eat, wherewithal shall they be clothed, what can they in safety do, when in all things lurk death and disaster? They dare not indulge their pet weakness for coffee. They eschew their favorite dainties. They fear to come in contact with their fellows or to touch the railing, counter or car strap, touched alike by all sorts and conditions of men. They fear contagion in the doctor's office and blood poisoning from his knife. They fear a thousand things in daily life. Meanwhile they still live.

Certainly science has evolved much truth, and its warnings are worth the heeding. But the warnings of science, like all other advice, should be referred to a judicious committee on common sense. It should be remembered that doctors sometimes disagree, and the verdict of one authority, or a half dozen, is not necessarily the verdict of science. Moreover, a truth may be too sweepingly applied. Circumstances and individuals differ, and what will hold good in one case needs modification in another. It seems to the hardened and incredulous that if life be really so beset with dangers, it is passing strange that generation after generation should have lived and thrived in their midst, and this also without a knowledge of their existence. If our ancestors, knowing nothing of these wonderful discoveries of hidden evil, managed to avoid the pitfalls, why not we? Does mere knowledge of danger make one more susceptible to its effects? Where is the wisdom that should accompany increasing knowledge? Natural living and confidence in nature are the best safeguards aginst such evils. Common sense is the best of disinfectants and work the best of remedies.—Minneapolis Times.

Seropian Bros., fruit-dealers of Fresno county, loaded ten tons of dried figs on wagons drawn by mules and started them for San Francisco overland. They claim that it is cheaper to do this than to pay the existing railroad rates. They allow eighteen days for the round trip, with ten mules and one driver. If this is successful they say they will follow it upon a large scale.

Three masked men attempted to hold up the bank of Sylvan Grove, Kan., at noon the other day. One was shot by the Cashier. He fell from his horse, when his companions deliberately emptied their pistols into the man's body, so that he could not live to tell who they were.

In proportion to the population France has more money in circulation than any other country. In France it averages $40.56 per capita; in the United States, 24.34; in England and Germany, $18.42; in Japan, $4.90 in China, $1.75 in Central America, 84 cents.

NEW AND DISTANT WORLDS.

Galileo in his "Sidereal Messenger" made a map of eighty new stars which he had discovered in the constellations of Orion's Belt and the "Sword;" and since then astronomer after astronomer, as is well known, has added various groups and galaxies to the 2,000 or 3,000 conspicuous stars of the first six magnitudes which can be always seen with the naked eye. It is curious and not complimentary to the good sense of mankind that those stars should have been looked upon as merely intended to spangle the sky and give light at night. As lamps they were always a failure. Sixty times the total starlight on the clearest night would not equal the illumination given by the moon; and 33,000,000 times their radiance would be required to equal sunlight. Yet the stars which are seen even by a powerful telescope are now known to be only an insignificant proportion of those actually existing inside "visible space."

Telescope photography, as practiced to-day in all the observatories, reveals, in almost every apparently blank region of the celestial sphere, countless new and distant worlds, lying far beyond all methods of mortal computation and measurement. The only foot rule with which we can at all estimate the scale of distances in the "visible universe" is light. This travels long the ether at the rate of 186,000 miles in a second, so that the ray which we receive from the sun left his surface eight minutes before it has reached our eyes.

By ingenious processes based on complex arithmetic astronomers have determined the distance of about eighty stars, and the nearest of all of them to our system is Alpha Centauri. The radiance of this star takes, however, about four years to reach human vision, while that which we perceive from Alpha Tauri or Aldebaran was projected from its glittering source twenty-seven years ago; and most of those seen deeper in the night sky are so far off that their present light left them 300 or 400 years back. Many are to-day visible whose beams have traveled to our gaze only after a lapse of thousands of years, and there must be radiant streams now on their way form heavenly bodies in the empyrean which will only reach the eyes of our very far off posterity.—North American Review.

PUBLIC MEN'S MEMORY.

Thomas B. Reed has never shown that he possessed the remarkable power of verbal memory that some of our public men have had. Consequently it is not surprising to hear that the speech which he delivered at Old Orchard a week ago was quite different from the speech which he had caused to be printed in advance for the use of the newspapers, says the Boston "Herald." Probably Mr. Reed could not deliver a long discourse from memory if he tried to do it. Few men have this power in the superlative degree, in which Roscoe Conkling had it. No man equaled him in feats of verbal recitation among our modern public men. When he prepared a speech of 12,000 words with which to open a campaign, it was his habit to have it put in type in advance, to memorize it, and then to repeat it word for word before a great audience. Once he had a "campaign opener" in advance in the office of the New York "Times." The "Times'" reporter took slips of the speech to the Brooklyn Academy of Music, where the speech was delivered, and followed the great orator. He discovered that Mr. Conkling was letter perfect in the recitation, but that he transposed one passage of considerable length, uttering it at a later time than he intended, yet not altering a word, and the speech was so divided by topics that this was possible without affecting the force of the argument with the audience. Mr. Blaine had no special power of this kind, and whenever he spoke at much length on any formal occasion he always wrote out what he had to say and read it from manuscript or from type proof. Among the men now prominent there is no one who excels Mr. Cleveland in his power of verbal memory. Mr. Cleveland can prepare a long address in writing, read it over once, and then stand up before an audience and repeat it without changing a word. Since Mr. Conkling's time there has been hardly any one prominent in public life who has sought to excel in this wonderful accomplishment. Probably Mr. Wilson of West Virginia can do better at it than any other man in Congress.

A POINT ABOUT ADDRESSING LETTERS.

"Don't address your envelopes 'city,'" said the giver of advice. "If you are in New York city write 'New York City;' if you are in Brooklyn write 'Brooklyn, and the postoffice people will be grateful, and your letters will be more likely to get to the right place. I'll tell you how I got broken of the habit. I gave an office boy half a dozen letters to mail on his way home. The little idiot lived in Brooklyn, and waited until he got across the bridge before he mailed them. They were all addressed 'city,' and you can easily see what happened."

The Tribune had an illustration several weeks ago of the danger of using the address "city." In Oakland, Cal., there is another Tribune. Some one in Oakland, sending to that paper, used the address simply, "The Tribune, city." That letter took the first mail for New York city and came plumb into the "Tribune" office here. The "city" was written obscurely and looked as much like "N. Y." as anything else. If "Oakland" had been written on the envelope the chances are that the letter, which fortunately was only a circular, by-the-way, would never have gone astray.—N. Y. Tribune.

A number of experts have been giving their opinion as to what the world of 1900 will see in the development of electricity. They say all the street cars and those of railways to points within 100 miles of the large cities will be propelled by this agent. Electric brooms will sweep the streets, electric fans will cool the air of homes in summer, electric cookers and lighting will do away with coal gas, and the domestic millennium will begin. Both the arc light and the incandescent lamp will be superseded by the Tesla illuminator, which gives beautiful and mysterious light without the interention of either globe or lamp. We shall telephone as easily across the ocean as we do now to our frinds in the next square. Wherever there are water powers or coal fields electrical energy will be transmitted to points a hundred miles away. Instead of loading coal upon cars and conveying it to the factory or machine shop to be converted into power, the power itself will be conveyed in the form of electricity, and this in turn will move all the necessary machinery for manufacturing and pump for irrigating. At this time a machine is at work in several large offices which receives and prints as fast as it arrives, all the news of the day. It is like a constant newspaper being printed all the time. Printed matter is rolled off upon a piece of paper in much the same fashion as the ticker prints.

It is not at all strange that the mision of Sir Charles Rivers Wilson to his country has been unattended by success. Sir Charles represents the British capilists upon whom C. P. Huntington unloaded 62 per cent of the stock of the decaying Central Pacific railroad, without relinquishing control of the line. Sir Charle's clients heard something drop shortly after the deal was made; dividends ceased and phantoms of assessments haunted them. The stockholders were desirous to know the why and wherefore, and so Sir Charles set out from London to see the railroad magnates and find out all about it. He saw the railroad people, but so far from finding out all about it, he confesses that his trip was a failure. The visitor had a royal time, though. He was wined and dined and speeded about the country in special cars as the guest of the Southern Pacific company of Kentucky. But as why his clients get no more dividends and the cause of the stump in Central Pacific stock, are as the hieroglyphics on the Egyptian needle to the visitor. When commissions with power to administer oaths and summon witnesses fail to get at the inside workings of Huntington's cinch corporations it is not to be wondered at that Sir Charles Rivers Wilson should fail.

The Christmas eve horror that occurred in the little mountain town of Silver Lake, Oregon, is almost without parallel in the history of casualties on this coast. Forty-one human beings, being nearly half the population, were loked in a hall and burned to death. Where does the blame lie? It is not with the careless participant in the holiday festivities who accidentally overturned the lamp. The responsibility should rest with the "blacksmith" builder, who, in constructing the hall provided but one exit and built no windows in the structure. While most cities have ordinances governing the construction of buildings erected for public use, it will now be in line for the legislature to enact similar laws for the state, to the end that a repetition of the Silver Lake horror be avoided.

It was not a long haired socialist nor a dynamiting anarchists who said that "The liberties of the people are more in danger from the aggressions of the courts than from mobs and riots." It was Thomrs Jefferson who thus laid himself liable to "proceedings in contempt"—Thomas Jefferson the statesman, who wrote the constitution upon which the courts and liberties of this country are based.

A dozen murders and shootin scrapes is the record so far this Christmas. Yet the people talk about ace on earth; good will to men."

A SILENCE BROKEN.

The summer fields bestarr'd with flowers—
The plumed grasses drenched with dew—
Serve but to calendar the hours
That space me from my past—and you.

Love, hast thou dreamed, in these gray calms
Of quiet pulse and leaden peace,
That time had brought his healing balms
And ancient sorrow found surcease?

Though I be dumb, dost thou not know
What peace and silence mean for me—
Poor soul, a-toss 'twixt bliss and woe,
Cursed with the dower of constancy.

Who hath one plaint—and must be mute;
Who hath one song—and may not sing!
Dear, you would weary of a lute
Which only owns a single string.

THE TRUMPETER.

"Margarita!"

"Here!" came a child's voice from beneath a linden heavy with bloom.

Franz Hennig entered the shade where Margarita, with a sleek yellow cat for companion, sat knitting.

"What is that?" the lad asked.

"A stocking, stupid. Hast thou not eyes?" the child answered, affecting impatience.

"For me, then?" Franz captured the needles and scrutinized the work with covert amusement.

"They were to be thine, but they grew so small I'm afraid they will be only large enough for the cat," Margarita sighed.

"So! Well, little one, thou shalt knit me stockings another time." He looked dreamily across the garden to the quaint old house which for three years had been his home.

Three years of preparation for the university, three years of unremitting kindness from the busy housewife and her aged mother, who had opened their doors to the lonely student, three years brightened by the enthusiastic devotion of a little child. Now this chapter must close.

From down the village street came the rattle of drums, a bugle note and the sound of cheers.

"It is a band!" shouted Margarita, seizing pussy and preparing to leave the shade.

"Wait," Franz said, with a thrill in his tones. "I have something to say to thee, liebchen. Dost thou know what the drum is crying? It is war!"

"War?" she responded, with childish indifference. "The mother said this morning that the soldiers were going to France. But why dost thou care, dear Franz?"

"Herr Steinert returns to the army today," he said gravely.

"Then there will be no more lessons on the beautiful trumpet for thee! I am sorry. But don't mind. Thou wilt have me."

"Margarita," he said sorrowfully, "I shall not have thee, for I go too."

"Thou!" She stared with wide, incredulous eyes. "Surely, not thou!"

"Liebchen," he whispered huskily. "Liebchen, wouldst thou have me idle at home when the rest are going? Wouldst thou have me a coward? I have no father or mother, no sister to mourn for me, while many go from dear ones who can ill spare them."

"Thou hast the mother and grandmother—and thou hast me!" she sobbed.

"True, I have thee, and thou wilt be a brave little German maid and make my going happy."

"When wilt thou go?" she asked, bravely trying to suppress the sobs.

"This afternoon."

"And who will ride thy horse, Prinz, when thou art gone?"

"Prinz will go with me, for I shall try for the cavalry, as my father did before me. Hark to the trumpet! If I might go as trumpeter! To sound the charge—that would be glorious! But it is not possible, of course. I hope I shall be near Steinert. But come; it is time I was making ready."

The hours crept away with rapid preparations and tearful partings. Through the little town sounded hurrying feet eager voices, snatches of warsongs, rolling drum or bugle's blare. In the midst of the turmoil Margarita was missing.

"Where can she be?" queried Frau Krummer anxiously. "Margarita, Margarita, Franz is going!" But no childish voice responded.

"We must go," cautioned grandmother, tying her bonnet strings with trembling fingers. "Come, Lotte."

"Margarita!" shouted Franz, but only a mocking echo gave answer. With sad eyes he gazed once more about the dear home, then turned away.

At the little station all was confusion. Tearful women clung to the fathers, brothers, sweethearts, who laughed and joked with heavy hearts. The long train was laden with troops from farther south, all pressing forward to join the crown prince's army at Landau. The moment for departure was at hand.

"Auf Wiedersehen, then, dear friends," said Franz, pressing a hearty kiss upon the cheeks of the two women who had taken him into their hearts. "Margarita, you will give her my dear love. I wish"——

"Franz, wait!" cried a small voice, and Margarita clutched his arm.

"From thy mother's grave," she cried, thrusting a bunch of blue cornflowers into his hands.

For an instant he caught her up in his arms.

"Thanks, liebchen," he whispered, then, setting her down hastily, ran through the crowd and jumped upon the slowly moving train.

"Auf Wiedersehen!" he cried, waving the blue flowers above his blond head.

"Auf Wiedersehen!" echoed Margarita, trying to smile through her tears.

Only a month had he passed with the regiment, but the intelligence of the young student had already made him conspicuous, and the time had been long enough to knit his ties of friendship with the men. Only a month, but in that time the boy had become a man.

Gripping his saber hilt, he settled himself firmly in the saddle. The fire of German artillery, which had cannonaded the French infantry to prepare the way for the charge, was slackening. From over the hill Franz heard the fierce crack of the enemy's rifles.

On Franz's right waited the two trumpeters of the squadron. The nearer one, eager faced and alert, scanned the heavens, where shells shrieked above their heads.

"This will be a hot place if we don't move soon," he growled.

"There is a hotter place over the hill, Steinert," said Franz.

Steinert nodded. Just then the order came. Clear and ringing it was sounded by the chief trumpeter. Clear and ringing sounded the trumpets in response. With a great clatter the cavalry swept up the hill to plunge into the fiery rain below.

There came a shrill singing through the sulphurous air, a deafening crash, and a shell had exploded to the right. Before it fell Holtz, the farther trumpeter.

Steinert's horse recoiled, then plunged heavily forward, throwing his rider over his head. In an instant Steinert was on his feet and running by Franz's side. Behind him came thundering line upon line of galloping squadrons.

"Can you take me up?" gasped Steinert, unmindful of the red stain which widened on his side.

"Up!" cried Franz. He checked Prinz's pace an instant, and the trumpeter was mounted behind him. The sight of battle had entered the cavalry horse, and down the hill he clattered under the double load, soon fully abreast of the squadron.

"You are hurt!" cried Franz. "Put your arms around me. So."

A dimness spread before the keen eyes of Steinert. There was a humming in his ears. The heavens were growing black!

Again came the trumpet call. With a wavering effort Steinert raised his instrument, but found no strength to blow.

"Franz," he groaned, "sound the charge!"

There was no time for question. Seizing the trumpet, Franz raised it to his lips. Clear and strong his repetition of the call rang out above the turmoil.

"Bravo!" groaned Steinert. "Now let me drop."

Steinert's hands loosened their grasp. His strength ebbed fast. But Franz caught the flaccid hands firmly in his left fist and drew the limp form closer to his broad shoulders. He dropped the bridle rein upon his pommel, thrust his right arm through the cord of his trumpet, grasped his saber with that hand, and so met the shock of battle.

Nightfall found the army of the crown prince gathered in and around a French village, far from the ground on which Franz, after the first charge, had delivered Steinert to the ambulance, the nurses and the doctors. Through the successive actions of the day the young student had served as trumpeter.

Shouting, foraging for provisions, cheering, singing and laughing as though on a holiday, the Bavarian troopers surged through the little captured town. After darkness had come on Franz, pushing his way through the crowded thoroughfares, found himself before an inn where many of his comrades were eating. They shouted to him to enter.

Winking and blinking as he came from the darkness into the strong light, Franz failed to see the signal slyly given by a burly dragoon. There was a hasty scraping of chairs on the bare floor, a clatter of feet, and the survivors of Franz's squadron sprang to their feet.

With an uplifted sausage the signal was given. Then "Hoch! Hoch!" rolled through the room and reverberated in the corners. Smiling faces turned to greet Franz; eager hands drew him to a seat. Dazed, uncomprehending, he slipped into his chair, and only upon repeated explanations did he understand the cause of the demonstration.

"Why, man," growled the burly dragoon, "don't you know it was a brave thing to cripple yourself with Steinert in the midst of a charge? Ach, but it was fine!"

"He is my friend," answered Franz simply, "my comrade."

There was a stir at the door and the clatter of a saber upon the floor. In an instant every hand was raised in salute. It was the captain.

"I find that both trumpeters of this squadron were disabled early in the action today, yet a trumpet has sounded the orders as they were given. How was that?" In eager words the story was told, and Franz found himself hustled and shouldered until he stood before the captain. With some uneasiness he raised his eyes to his superior's face. Had he transgressed in taking upon himself another's office. But there was no severity in the answering glance.

"How came you to know the calls?" the captain asked kindly.

Franz told briefly of the lessons he had received from Steinert back in the fatherland.

"Then keep the place you have taken today, as Holtz is dead and Steinert too badly wounded for service. It pleases you, I see. It pleases me also. Good night!"

And again the room resounded to shouts, deep and sonorous, "Hoch, Hoch, Hoch!"

* * * * * * *

A year! Joy and sorrow, hope and despair, laughter and tears, victory and defeat—these are its harvest. But above the sobs of those who will not be comforted rolls a tide of rejoicing. The troops are returning!

"Mother!"

An eager face was thrust in at the half opened door, followed after an interval of serious inspection by a small body. Margarita was unusually excited.

Her round cheeks burned cherry red, her blue eyes shone. She held the yellow cat tightly under one arm.

"Well, child, what is it?" asked her mother.

"Thou knowest godmother gave me money for a gold chain?" Margarita ventured, emphasizing her remark with a plaintive yowl from the compressed puss.

"Surely. It is high time it was bought. Tomorrow"——

"Mother," cried Margarita desperately, "I want the money for something else."

"What then?" asked Frau Krummer.

Margarita burst into tears, cast away the cat and clung to her arm.

"Do let me—do let me!" she sobbed. "Dear mother, let me go to Berlin with Frau Sucher and Frau Biedermann to meet the soldiers. I am a big girl now—9 years old, almost—and Frau Sucher will take care of me!"

She opened her previously hidden hand and revealed a little hoard of money.

"It will be enough, and Franz will be so glad to see me!" she said.

With round arms choking her into acquiescence and fresh lips pressed against her cheek, Frau Krummer considered the question.

Well, the good mother had a warm place in her heart for the lad who had no kin to rejoice over his homecoming. So when Frau Sucher went up to Berlin a small girl, beaming with joy, at her side gazed from above a huge bunch of cornflowers at the strange sights slipping past the car window.

For Margarita the journey was far from tedious. At every station, laughing, light hearted people crowded upon the train, all bound upon one errand—the welcome of Germany's warrior sons. When other amusements palled, the cornflowers were woven into a large wreath by Margarita's deft little fingers, and her heart swelled with joy at the thought that she would greet dear Franz on the morrow and make him forget that neither father nor mother nor sister nor sweetheart awaited his coming.

The morning dawned fair, and Frau Sucher and her charge were early abroad. They found the streets already thronged and gay with flowers and banners and lined with benches and platforms.

Frau Sucher established herself, with Margarita, as near the statue of Frederick the Great as possible, proceeding to make herself comfortable with her lunchbasket.

Far away sounded strains of martial music. The troops were passing around the old town wall. There was an eager movement in the throng. All faces turned by a common impulse toward the Brandenburg Thor. Yes, they were coming!

Carefully holding the blue wreath of cornflowers, Margarita craned her small neck, but, alas! could see nothing beyond a sea of heads. Tears of disappointment rose to her eyes.

After all, Franz would think himself forgotten in the general rejoicing! The journey would be in vain! It was not to be borne.

Slipping unnoticed from Frau Sucher's side, Margarita wormed her way through the crowd until she stood behind the police who mounted guard along the way.

Thrusting her head out as far as possible, she paid scant heed to the passing troops until the sky blue uniforms of the Bavarians filed by. Catching her breath with anxiety, she scrutinized the brave array. Among so many could she find her Franz?

Suddenly her heart gave a quick bound, for, with the sunlight dazzling his sad blue eyes and glinting from his shining trumpet, came Franz—browned, thinner and with a strange yellow down upon his lip. But Margarita knew him.

With a joyful cry she darted between two astonished policemen into the open space beyond. At this sudden apparition in white Prinz swerved sharply, then stretched out his head in recognition.

"Franz!" cried a childish voice. "Dear Franz!"

It was not a finished speech, but it served its purpose, for a loving welcome shone in the child's face, and high above her head she held the cornflower wreath.

All sadness faded from Franz's eyes.

"Margarita, liebchen!" he cried, and with a quick movement bent and caught the wreath before the laughing policemen led Margarita back to her distracted guardian.

No, he was not forgotten! Turning in the saddle, he kissed his hand to the child. Then with trumpet wreathed with the flowers the monarch most loved, with head erect and happiness in his heart, Franz Hennig, the trumpeter, rode before the aged emperor.—Marion Dickinson in Youth's Companion.

An Ant Army's Victory Over a Snake.

"While camping in Alabama during the late war," said Colonel Crossman of Dayton, O., "I witnessed an attack of a band of black ants upon a striped snake. One evening, while I was trying to go to sleep after a long day's march, I felt something move under my head. I lifted one corner of the blanket and found a snake between 3 and 4 feet in length. I quickly hit it with a small stick, but the reptile seemed hardly stunned, so I picked it up on the end of the stick and threw it about 15 feet away.

"The snake landed on a large ant hill. Almost instantly the ants poured forth from their nest, which was underneath, and began a vigorous attack upon the intruder, who was soon covered by scores of his assailants, biting him fearfully. The battle raged with fury, the snake writhing about in torture. The contest at first seemed an unequal one, for the snake was rapidly thinning out his persecutors; but, on the other hand, the ants were very numerous and quick in their aggressive movements. The snake, with one blow of his tail, would kill or wound a long line of ants, but the active little creatures were soon re-enforced by fresh troops and fought with a desperation wonderful to behold. I was astonished beyond measure to see the tactics of the ants. When they saw their numbers were being lessened, they dispatched couriers for fresh relays of soldiers, who appeared on the scene in due time to replace the killed or wounded. The moon, after a time, lit up the scene, but as there appeared no near termination of the struggle I gave up watching it and went to sleep. Before striking tents the next morning I went to look at the battle ground. The slain insects were scattered in every direction, but there were six or seven watchful ants upon the back of the snake, which lay stretched out dead near the ant hill."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

GODS MADE TO ORDER.

The Chinese Variety Are of Both Sexes and All Sizes and Prices.

Chinese josses come from Amoy and Canton, where there are joss factories which supply Celestials with any shape, design or size desired. Josses are either male or female. If the former, they are fat and ungainly; if the latter, they are possessed of four arms.

The making of these images is simplicity itself, the manufacturers relying upon wooden or metal molds. These are filled with wet clay, which dries, is then touched up, dipped in molten glaze and allowed to cool. An average workman can make a hundred gods in a day. The clay used is kaolin and is shaded from red and gray to white and costs about a cent a pound. A good jossmaker can earn from 20 to 40 cents a day, while an image costs to make on an average about 3 cents. Natives pay 5 cents for them; foreigners, $5. Josses can be made in all colors, opaque, transparent or colorless. The most effective work is made by painting the clay with thick white paint and then dipping it in the glaze. Chinese curio dealers are very fond of antique josses, as they can be planted and dug up to order from the time of Confucius to the present day. The most popular is the "black joss." This is made by painting a kaolin cast with paint made of tar, bitumen, shellac or varnish, wrapping it in paper and then firing it in a furnace. In this way any shade of black can be obtained, and the color burns through, as can be proved by breaking.

The josses carved from wood and covered with gaudy colors are often very ancient. The prices vary from a few cents to $500 or more, according to the size, workmanship and amount of decorations. They range in size from an inch to 10 or 12 feet. In the larger sizes the carving is of a superior quality and the coloring admirable. Josses carved out of stone are rare and expensive. Those made of jade, pale green or light blue, fetch marvelous prices, while white, yellow or brown are almost as expensive. One of these, belonging to Lin, the ex-governor of Formosa, is about 8 inches high and is valued at $10,000. It is said to be 1,500 years old. In Fuchan they make josses out of stealite and selinite of various colors. The stone is so soft that the manufacturer, by rubbing the newly made images with sand, can produce a most deceptive antique appearance.—New York World.

LABOUCHERE KICKS.

What Some Folks Call Generosity He Declares Is a "Monstrous Job."

The queen's generosity in providing palaces and other residences for foreign princes and princesses at the expense of the British taxpayer is again rousing the ire of Radicals, says a London letter. The scandal has hardly subsided over the thrifty pensioners of her majesty, who have been turning Hampton Court palace into a boarding house, when now it is announced that she has been pleased to grant the studhouse, also at Hampton Court, to Princess Frederica of Hanover and her husband, with the benefit of the survivorship. The princess is one of the wealthiest personages in Europe, and she only rarely comes to England for a brief visit. It is announced that the studhouse is to be extensively repaired and improved for her occasional occupation. This moves Mr. Labouchere to remark:

"If this arrangement has really been made, it is a most monstrous job, and one of a peculiarly objectionable kind, as during the reigns of George IV and William IV parliament protested so strongly against such reversionary grants that they were altogether discontinued of late years. However, the queen has privately revived the system of giving royal residences with survivorship, and I am informed that nearly every warrant which has recently been granted has contained the obnoxious reversionary clause. The next sovereign of these realms will have to live a long time before he has either houses or apartments to give away.

"I believe in at least one case the queen has signed a warrant granting what really was an official residence to the wife of the present occupant in case she survives her husband."

THE POWER OF THE PRESS.

How It Might Be the Highest Terrestrial Illustration of Omnipotence.

Colonel Pat Donan, the celebrated correspondent, speaking on the subject of editors of newspapers to a Philadelphia News man, said:

We speak of England, France, Germany, Russia and the United States as "the great powers," but among all the powers of earth the press stands easily first and greatest. If every journalist fully appreciated his power and his responsibility and every journal were known to be absolutely truthful, honest, fearless and incorruptible beyond the reach of wheeding, bribery or intimidation; wearing the dog collar of no party, section, sect or faction; patriotic and not partisan, always for the right and against the wrong, a union of all the newspapers would be the highest terrestrial illustration of omniscience and omnipotence. Such a combination could overturn any principality, throne or dominion under heaven, as a herd of Texas steers might upset a child's array of tin soldiers. It could establish and maintain any system, cause, creed or institution the editors chose to support.

Civilization culminates in the power press, and the bounds of civilization are limited by the circulation of the daily papers. There is no civilized speech or language where their voice is not heard or their influence is not felt. A few weeds soaked in bilge water, or a little calomel rolled in sweetened dough, with plenty of printers' ink, will make a millionaire of any pauperistic quack in five years, whether it is the brains, hearts, livers, lungs, kidneys or gizzards of newspaper reading gudgeons his humbug panacea claims to regenerate. A few thousand acres of iron, coal or timber, a fair flatboat harbor or two or three intersecting railroads, with reasonable circumjacent possibilities, and abundant advertising, will build a city out of nothingness anywhere in a decade. There is no enterprise or business, benefaction or villainy that cannot be pushed into triumph or driven to failure by the newspapers. Great reputations are created by them out of nothing and wrecked by them for amusement. In this country governors, senators and even presidents are made by them—often out of material intended for tinkers and peddlers, baseball players, gamblers, shysters, pickpockets and thugs.

Alexander vs. Barnes et al.—Filed original summons.

Alexander vs. Robinson et al.—Filed original summons.

THURSDAY, Jan. 3, 1895

Estate of Edgar M. Turner, deceased.—Filed petition for letters of administration.

Mr. and Mrs. F. McIver spent New Years at Independence.

R. C. Spear of Lone Pine spent a couple of days in town this week.

District Attorney Forbes is visiting at Bishop with his family.

Mark D. Rochford of Big Pine spent several days in town this week.

Mr. and Mrs. B. Rhine went up the Valley last Wednesday on a short visit.

The mountains were clouded over this morning and evidently more snow fell.

J. W. P. Laird Esq. has returned home to Bakersfield after making a short visit at Bishop.

J. J. Gunn went out to the Minnietta, on Wednesday. He will probably resume operations there.

The Lone Pine Canal Co. has changed its principal place of business to Lone Pine. See notice.

P. Lesbarreges and H. C. Hamilton came up from Lone Pine last Monday to attend the ball on New Years eve.

School Superintendent S. W. Austin came up from Lone Pine early in the week and spent a couple of days in town.

Mrs. Ed. Clark came down from Bishop at the end of last week to join her husband, who will act as under-Sheriff for A. M. Given.

Peter Laird came down from Bishop at the end of last week and has been visiting in town since then. Uncle Pete for all his 73 years, is as young as a boy.

John Shepherd started for San Francisco on Thursday's train. Mr. Shepherd has been in poor health for a long time and hopes to benefit by change of climate.

Walter S. Schee and William F. Schene of Los Angeles were in town during the week on business at the local Land Office. The former returned to Los Angeles on Wednesday.

At a meeting of the Independence Track association held last Monday evening an assessment of fifteen dollars per share was levied upon the capital stock, for the purpose of paying off indebtedness. See notice.

Dr. J. S. McQueen will be down from Bishop on to-day's train and will remain in Independence about a week doing dental work. The doctor's success in the past is his best recommendation for future work.

The ball given by the Harmony Orchestra on New Year's eve, proved a very pleasant affair. There were just enough present to fill Mair's Hall without crowding and the fun was kept up until five o'clock in the morning.

The Board of Supervisors meet in regular session next Monday. Frank Shaw and J. R. Eldred, the two new members, begin their duties at that time. The Board will consist of four Democrats and one Peoples' Party. Frank Fitzgerald being the oldest member in point of service, will be elected Chairman.

Superintendent McIver of the Eastside Canal states that a movement is on foot by which a considerable tract of land held by the company will be brought under cultivation. This is a step in the right direction, as the property can be disposed of far more readily when its possibilities in the agricultural line are developed.

The officers elect for the ensuing four years will assume the duties next Monday. There have not been many changes. Judge Gill holds for two years yet. A. M. Given succeeds J. S. Gorman as Sheriff. D. J. Hession, Clerk, Auditor and Recorder, P. W. Forbes, District Attorney, W. T. Bunney, Treasurer, and Joseph Seely, Surveyor, succeed themselves. I. J. Woodin succeeds H. H. Howell as Coroner and S. W. Austin takes the place of J. H. Shannon as Superintendent of Schools.

A Probable Resumption Of Work In The Holmes Mine.

Colonel W. J. Sutherland, Managing Director of the Holmes Company, arrived in Hawthorne Friday and took a special from here to Candelaria. On his return Sunday Mr. Sutherland said that he was testing the ore and tailings of the Holmes mine with a view to working the same on a large scale by a new leaching process. Thos. Reed, the well known mineralogist, is at present making tests, and on his report depends the action of the company. Mr. Sutherland said he thought work would begin within a month. There are half a million tons of tailings at Belleville and Candelaria; and a plant will have to be built to do the work on a large scale. There are also large bodies of ore in the mine which will no doubt pay well if treated by the new process. This is a gleam of light through the dark clouds that have overhung Candelaria since the big mine closed, and it is the earnest hope of everybody that the tests now being made will prove satisfactory. The report published in the Enterprise that Mr. Sutherland is negotiating a sale of Ed Brown's mine at Silver Star is a fairy tale. He did not visit the Star district but he has arranged with Mr. Reed to go there and inspect the mines in his interest. Col. Sutherland is a good man for any camp, and it is to be hoped that he can secure some of the promising claims there that are now comparatively non-productive for want of capital. Mr. Sutherland will probably return to Esmeralda during the present month.—Walker Lake Bulletin.

A New Enterprise,

It is highly probable that during the year 1895 a flourishing coloney will be established in the vicinity of Alvord. In December Charles M. Pilgrim made a desert filing of 320 acres north of the Senger ranch, and immediately went to Los Angeles to secure assistance for developing a water supply. Last week Walter and William Senee, large contractors at Los Angeles, came to the valley, and in connection with a friends have located about all the vacent land in the vicinity of Alvord. No less than six desert filings have been made during the past two days besides homesteads. The projectors have ample means to push the work to a successful termination. The land is all of the finest quality and the water supply from Owens River will be abundant. The scheme will bring about four thousand acres of land under cultivation. It is understood that it is the plan of the projectors to bring the whole area under cultivation as soon as possible.

The Southern Country.

H. M. Yerington, James A. Yerington and A. M. Ardery passed south on the C. & C. yesterday morning, their objective point being Candelaria. James A. Yerington reports that in the Brown mine in Silver Star mining district ore is plentifully in sight which assays $100,000 to the ton. It is said that the lessees of the Pamlico mine at Hawthorne are taking out large quantities of gold and silver, and that if their present prospects are realized they will be independently rich before the end of another year. James Yerington once owned a share in the Pamlico. It is said that H. M. Yerington, his son and Mr. Ardery are going to the southern country to have a general look at the available and purchasable mining properties there. This section seems to have had a considerable boom since Colonel Southerland of the Holmes and Brown mines returned to America. The present indications are that capital will seek investment there, and that developments on a large scale will be undertaken.—Enterprise.

R. W. Scott, the jeweler, writes that he will be in Independence soon with a large and well selected stock of watches and jewelry. Anybody having fine watch and other repairing to be done should have it in readiness on Mr. Scotts arrival, as his stay will be short.

It is rather complimentary to Senator Perkins that the leading Democrats of California are anxious to see him elected to succeed himself in the United States Senate over every other man who has been prominently spoken of in that connection; but it is rather discouraging to them to hear the protagonists of Mike De Young swaggering around San Francisco and boasting that he has "a dead mortal clinch" on the office.

HINDOO CHILD MARRIAGES.

The Brahmin has to get his daughter married before she attains puberty. This custom has crept into religion. The Hindoo religion strictly forbids single life for woman or man; especially must the woman be married. Hence there are no old maids in India. Sometimes one may meet an old "cranky" bachelor, who has remained unmarried because he was too poor to marry, or because his character was not good; but even these are seldom found except in the lower classes. If a man is not married at the latest by his twenty-fifth year his reputation suffers. It is a belief that those who have a son go to heaven, when the son, after the death of his parents, performs the spiritual rites. However, this may be, whether they go to heaven or not, this severe rule tends to a strict cultivation of home life.

Owing to this rule, if a Brahmin's daughter attains puberty before marriage the father is disgraced; he loses his caste and no one will marry the girl. Thus when a poor man has more than one duaughter it is a misfortune for him. The Hindoo father himself has to find out a suitable husband for his daughter, so he goes to a gentleman who has a son. He first makes inquiries about the family, the property, the health and education of the boy. Then he asks the father of the boy to marry his son to his daughter. The father of the boy asks for dowry, and the amount of this is fixed according to the means of the man who asks for it and not of the man who gives it; that is to say, if the father of the boy is very rich he asks thousands of dollars. Hence the Hindoo father of a girl has to spend much for the marriage of his daughter, for he always wishes to see her married into a rich family.

Indian Agent Wisdom at Muskogee, I. T., says in his report: "Good Choctaw beer, a drink compounded of barley, hops, tobacco, fish berries and a small amount of alcohol, is manufactured without stint in many portions of the agency. It is certain that its sale is a fruitful source of evil, disorder and crime."

ROYAL LEADS ALL.

The Royal Baking Powder is the purest and strongest baking powder made, and has received the highest award at all the great international and State fairs, wherever exhibited in competition with others.

The judge of awards on baking powder at the late Chicago Fair, Prof. H. W. Wiley, writes that the impertinent claims of other companies that they received the highest award for strength and purity are false; that no such awards were given them.

THE PLANET MARS.

Recent Observations Demonstrate That There Has Been No Signaling.

Mars last month was nearer the earth than at any time during its orbit, and the telescopes of every observatory in the country were leveled at the great red star which has aroused so much discussion during the past year.

There have been some interesting discoveries, which go to prove almost conclusively that the planet is inhabited. The most important is that of the gemination or doubling of the famous canals. The great Italian astronomer, Giovanni Schiaparelli, many years ago said that the canals were in double lines, but his works being in Italian the fact was not generally known. M. Flammarion has translated some of his works into French, however, and renewed attention has been paid to these canals with the result that their being double has been proved beyond doubt.

They can hardly be natural, for they ramify in all directions from the poles, the region of melting snow, and in a triangular manner that is evidently the result of design.

They have been not alone proved to be double, but it has recently been noticed that wherever two canals meet there is a round, dark spot, evidently a junction. These junctions occur in every case where two canals intersect and are presumably for the purpose of preventing the waters from overflowing the banks where they meet. They are much wider than the canals and therefore give the opposing streams room to spread without overflowing.

The fanciful theory of the Martians signaling to the earth is completely destroyed. The points of light have been proved to be merely snow peaks illuminated by the sun. The waxing and waning of these lights, which has been put forward as an argument in favor of the signaling theory, is due to the accumulation and melting of the snow.

It is probable, almost certain, that the inhabitants of Mars do not know half as much about our planet as we know about theirs. Our globe is almost always half concealed by clouds and mists, while the atmosphere of Mars is always clear and cloudless.

The many careful observations of Mars during 1894 have undoubtedly been much stimulated by the widespread interest which has of late been manifested by the public in the various theories which have been started. The combined verdict of the astronomers in charge of the various observatories seems to be as follows:

The signaling theory is unalloyed bosh.

The canals, from their shape, direction and appearance, generally go far to prove the habitation of Mars, and the recent demonstration of their being double helps the theory along. Some observers claim that the dark patches which are visible at times are patches of vegetation, presumably forests. This theory is upheld by some and denounced by others, and the only theory in which all seem agreed is the canal theory.

If the canals really are artificial, as claimed, they represent an amount of labor which is well nigh inconceivable to us, even in these days of colossal engineering undertakings. They are many in number, many thousands of miles in length and of a uniform width of 200 miles. To theorize upon the manner of men who can have carried out such work is to lose ourselves altogether in a sea of speculation.—New York Herald.

A Story of Mark Twain.

One summer not long ago while the celebrated humorist was at his Elmira home a smooth faced man rang the bell and told the girl who came to the door that he wanted to see Mark Twain, or Samuel L. Clemens, as he is properly called.

"Give me your card, and I will take it to him," said the girl.

The stranger did so and waited in the hallway.

Twain studied the card for a few moments. He couldn't remember the name. As it was a French one, he thought possibly that it was some notable he had met abroad, and who wished to renew acquaintance. So he went down stairs and shook hands with the stranger.

"Now, Mr. Clemens," began the visitor in fluent English, "you are wondering who I am. Well, you have never met me before. I simply came here to deny a certain passage in your book, 'Innocents Abroad.' Now, when you went to Paris," the stranger went on smoothly, "you said that the most terrible thing that ever happened to you was the shave you got there on your arrival." Twain began to look astonished.

"Now," continued the stranger suavely, "I am a Frenchman, and, moreover, a barber. My intention in coming to you is to give you one of my shaves, and if you don't praise it then you don't know what a good shave is. Now, what do you say?"

"Well, in the first place, I lost all desire to get shaved after I took the one you refer to. In the second place, I consider shaving immoral. In the third place, I shouldn't want the job of shaving one of your cheeks. Good day."—Syracuse Post.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

Its Translation Into English Analyzed by a Modern Greek Scholar.

Is the translation of the Lord's Prayer contained in our authorized English version a faithful representation of the original recorded in Matthew? The negative is maintained in the October number of The Contemporary Review by Mr. A. N. Jannaris, whose reason for raising the question is that he is a Greek who has spent his life in studying his native language not only in its classical stage, but also and more particularly in its post classical and modern stages. He says, truly enough, that Hellenic scholarship in the ordinary sense of familiarity with the classical authors is quite as likely to be misleading as helpful in the interpretation of New Testament Greek. This the international language, or lingua franca, current in Asia Minor and Syria at the time of Jesus, was simply a vernacular speech and not intended to be used as an artistic literary medium. Indeed Mr. Jannaris reaffirms what the late Professor Sophocles of Harvard used to say that New Testament Greek, though separated from classical antiquity only by two or three centuries, is much less like it than it is like Byzantine, or even, in many respects, modern Greek. It is also to be remembered that the Latin of the Vulgate—that is to say, Jerome's revision of the so called Old Italic version—powerfully influenced Luther and the English translators of the New Testament. Of course the Vulgate, as we now have it, is the late revision made by Clement VIII in 1593.

These general considerations have led this modern Greek to attempt a new English version of the Lord's Prayer. Beginning with the first sentence, "Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name," Mr. Jannaris pronounces this an adequate rendering, though he directs attention to the stress laid in the original, through collocation, on the phrase "which art in heaven," for it suggests a contradistinction to the Lord of this world. It is contended, on the other hand, that the following clause, "thy kingdom come," represents but vaguely the original. It is pointed out that "kingdom" is merely a translation of regnum, the Latin term for the two classical Greek expressions basileion and basileia. In the case, however, of New Testament Greek, particularly that of the Synoptic gospels, basileia (the word used in the Lord's Prayer) supplies the abstract noun, not so much of basileus, "king," as of kurios, "lord," for the latter, though very frequent, has no corresponding abstract of its own in common use. Had Jesus wished to express the idea of "kingdom" he would have resorted to the term then current, basileion, which is still the only designation in modern Greek. But he is careful to employ neither for himself nor for his Father the title of "king," basileus. Indeed he explicitly disclaims it, because it would have planted wrong expectations in the Jews and compromised himself in the eyes of the Roman authorities. When he refers to himself or to his Father, he uses the word kurios, "lord," for which the Latin equivalent is dominus, while for the abstract notion of this expression he invariably has recourse to basileia—that is, "lordship," or "dominion." According, then, to Mr. Jannaris, the right version of the clause in question is "thy dominion come"—that is, thy sway be extended from heaven to this world, now ruled over by the adversary.

The English translation of the next clause of the Lord's Prayer, "thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth," is deemed admissible, although "will" is not an exact rendering of the original word thelema and seems to have been employed with reference partly to the Latin term voluntas and partly to the classical Greek verb thelo. But thelema is a popular term peculiar to post classical and modern Greek and serves as a substitute for the classical words boule, bouleuma and diagnosis, meaning "determination" or "fixed purpose." Mr. Jannaris would therefore English the clause as follows: "thy (fixed) purpose be done."

To the succeeding words, "Give us this day our daily bread," a good deal of space is devoted, the crux being the Greek adjective ton eplousion, which in the Old Latin version was rendered quotidianum and which reappears in our authorized English translation as "daily." As the word epiousios here presents itself for the first time in the Greek language, much erudition and argument from analogy have been expended on it. Mr. Jannaris gives reasons for believing that it was coined as an antithesis to periousios, a term employed by the Septuagint (with which either Jesus himself or the author of Matthew's gospel was obviously familiar) to represent the Hebrew adjective segulla, meaning "abounding in earthly goods." The significance then of the antithetical word, epiousios, would be to disclaim anything beyond the subsistence needed to support life for the day. So that the clause should be rendered, "Give us this day our mere, or simple, bread."

Subjected, likewise, to detailed criticism are the words in our English version, "and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." It is denied that the prayer, "lead us not into temptation," can be reconciled with either the precepts of the gospel or logic. It is impossible to conceive of God as tempting mankind, and such an idea is repudiated in the epistle of James—i, 13, "Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted by God." Commentators have tried to escape the incongruity by employing what, according to classical rules, would be a misinterpretation of the verb in the original, eisenegnkes. It is pointed out by Mr. Jannaris that, if post classical Greek had been duly studied, it would have been known that in the time of Jesus the active voice of the verb was constantly gaining ground upon the middle voice and is undoubtedly substituted for the latter in the passage quoted. Not only, therefore, is it desirable, but accurate to render the verb in English, "have us not brought into," or do thou "let us not fall into." As for the Greek noun, peirasmos, translated "temptation," grounds are presented for holding that a more exact English correlative would be "a tempter's snare."

Let us see now what, according to our modern Greek scholar, would be a faithful English transcript of the Lord's Prayer, the choice of appropriate and effective diction being naturally left by him to more competent authorities. Such a version would run somewhat as follows: "Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy dominion come, thy (fixed) purpose be done as in heaven, so on earth. Give us this day our mere (or simple) bread, and forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors theirs, and let us not fall into a tempter's snares, but deliver us from the evil one." It is well known that the appended doxology is spurious.

Time Lost by an Overcoat.

He was an eminent practitioner in Philadelphia, and one of his patients noticed that he more often than otherwise came into the room with his overcoat on. Questioned about it, the doctor said:

"Whenever I can, I keep on my overcoat. It saves time. I average, say, 40 calls a day. Now, I cannot get on and off my overcoat in less than a minute. This would be 40 minutes wasted. I must save my time, and that is one of the best ways of doing it."

"But, doctor," expostulated the patient, "you would not recommend such a practice to me. You would at once say to me that keeping on my overcoat in the house would excite perspiration and so give me a cold when I went out."

"Yes, I would say that to you—you are the patient, I the doctor. Do as I say, not as I do."—Philadelphia Call.

GOOD WORD FOR AMERICANS.

Take them as a whole, the Americans are the kindliest race on the face of the earth. In spite of their eagerness, their push, their desire to be in the front rank at all times and all seasons, the true American seldom fails in kindness, says the London "Spectator." He wants badly to prevent any one getting ahead of him, mentally, physically and morally, but if his competitor falls in the struggle he will make untold sacrifices to help him up. The rule in American business is pure cut throat competition, carried to its logical conclusion. You are expected to press and push every point as far as it can possibly be pushed and pressed, and no one is expected to consider whether, in making a commercial coup, you will not ruin Brown, Jones and Robinson. The moment, however, that Brown, Jones or Robinson actually goes under he is treated with the utmost generosity and consideration.

The hand which struck him down is instantly stretched forth to help him, and as much care and trouble are used to put him on his feet once again as were originally employed to knock him off them. In social intercourse this kindness and sunniness is specially attractive. The American will take infinite pains to make the merest stranger happy. He is courteous and pleasant-spoken, not like the Frenchman, from convention, but from the sense of pleasure which his instinctive optimism teaches him to diffuse. His optimism has even proved strong enough to break down the shyness which naturally belongs to the English race. One sees, no doubt, survivals of it in the American; but in most cases the sense that all is for the best in the best possible of worlds has mastered it altogether.

WELL PUT.

"It makes me mournful to think," said an old veteran of the G. A., "that this good, right arm of mine which carried a musket in a hundred fights, should now be all doubled up and out of shape with rheumatism." "Well, look here, where have you been living all this time, that you don't know St. Jacob's Oil will cure you?" And straightway he went for a bottle, and lo! he was cured also. The straight way is the sure way for the accomplishment of any good in this life, and the seeking of the great remedy for the cure of pain is surely the best way. Ask those who have been benefited and they will put you straight.

The Shaker religion, which had its origin among the Mud Bay Indians of Thurston county, Wash., is rapidly spreading in Washington. A revival has just closed in Chehalia county and the vangelists are now on the way to Pacific county. It differs from the Shaker belief common in other sections of the country. It forbids the use of kerosene oil for illumination; also, the use of tobacco and intoxicating liquors of any kind. It has worked wonders among the Thurston and Chehalis county Indians, who, previous to the introduction of the Shakers, were not noted for morality and sobriety.

PROGRESS.

People who get the greatest degree of comfort and real enjoyment out of life, are those who make the most out of their opportunities. Quick perception and good judgment lead such promptly to adopt and make use of those refined and improved products of modern inventive genius which best serve the needs of their physical being. Accordingly, the most intelligent and progressive people are found to employ the most refined and perfect laxative to regulate and tone up the stomach, liver, and bowels, when in need of such an agent—hence the great popularity of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. These are made from the purest, most refined and concentrated vegetable extracts, and from forty-two to forty-four are contained in each vial, which is sold at the same price as the cheaper made and more ordinary pills found in the market. In curative virtues, there is no comparison to be made between them and the ordinary pills, as any one may easily learn by sending for a free sample, (four to seven doses) of the Pellets, which will be sent on receipt of name and address on a postal card.

ONCE USED THEY ARE ALWAYS IN FAVOR.

The Pellets cure biliousness, sick and bilious headache, dizziness, costiveness, or constipation, sour stomach, loss of appetite, coated tongue, indigestion, or dyspepsia, windy belchings, "heart-burn," pain and distress after eating, and kindred derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels. Put up in glass vials, therefore always fresh and reliable. One little "Pellet" is a laxative, two are mildly cathartic. As a "dinner pill," to promote digestion, take one each day after dinner. To relieve distress from over-eating, they are unequaled. They are tiny, sugar-coated granules; any child will readily take them.

Accept no substitute that may be recommended to be "just as good." It may be better for the dealer, because of paying him a better profit, but he is not the one who needs help. Address for free sample,

A HERALD OF THE INFANT YEAR.

Clip the last thirty years or more from the century, and the segment will represent the term of the unbounded popularity of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The opening of the year 1895 will be signalized by the appearance of a fresh Almanac of the Bitters, in which the uses, derivation and action of this world-famous medicine will be lucidly set forth. Everybody should read it. The calendar and astronomical calculations to be found in this brochure are always astonishingly accurate, and the statistics, illustrations, humor and other reading matter rich in interest and full of profit. The Hostetter Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., publish it themselves. They employ more than sixty hands in the mechanical work, and more than eleven months in the year are consumed in its preparation. It can be obtained, without cost, of all druggists and country dealers, and is printed in English, German, French, Welsh, Norwegian, Swedish, Holland, Bohemian and Spanish.

PREVENTION BETTER THAN CURE.

It is no easy thing to cure lung trouble when it once fairly gets a hold upon the system. It can easily be prevented by the use of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. Just as soon as any intimation of soreness about the lungs or stiffness of the joints appears put on one of these plasters, and you will be sure to gain great advantage.

So also with rheumatism. A cold is a comparatively slight thing. The application of an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER to any part affected by it will not only relieve, but overcome it. If, however, the cold gets a firm hold on the joints and muscles, rheumatic pains are not so quickly overcome. To cure is good, to prevent is better.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS will relieve rheumatism.

SAXONY SHEEP.

A Chapter in the History of Sheep Raising.

AMERICAN BRED SPANISH MERINO.

Their Fleeces Find a Special Demand and at High Prices—Not Exhibited at the World's Fair.

One of the most interesting chapters in the history of sheep raising in the United States comprises the period from 1820 to 1846, when the brilliant prospects of the Saxony sheep and its fleeces were utterly dashed to the ground by the tariff of 1846. This industry may be said to have been a creature of national legislation from its begining, or, at least, from 1828 to the fatal ending. Spanish merino sheep were brought in at a time when the American people were seeking entire independence from the mother country in every line of product used by the people. Previous to this time the sheep of the country were a mongrel mixture of breeds, whose fleeces were only used in clothes for working people. The finer grades of clothing goods were imported. The Spanish merino sheep widely accommodated itself to the conditions afforded in this country, the crosses giving fleeces that very nearly approached the pure breed in fineness and beauty. From 1802 to 1820 the Spanish merinos became widely disseminated and to all outside appearances seemed capable of holding their own against anything that might dispute posession with them. But the Saxony's fleece was so fine, so beautiful, and the cloths were so excellent, and broadcloth suits so aristocratic and within the reach of well-to-do people that no other sheep could satisfy the people. To add to the popularity of the Saxony sheep the wool was worth from $2 to $2.50 per pound. The farmers were captivated with such prices, and not stopping to think about the increased weight of the Sanish merino fleeces and the slight difference in the prices of the two kinds of wool, kept on buying Saxony sheep at fancy prices. It was found when the crash came that nearly all Spanish sheep had been crossed with these exceedingly fine wooled Saxons, and the constitution of the flocks of the country had been lessened in vigor. It was not difficult to care for high-priced sheep, whose fleeces brought four or five dollars each, but when the bottom fell out and values went down, the flocks went to destruction. This afforded the opportunity for the Spanish merinos; but, alas! they had been greatly impaired, as most people then thought, by the Saxony cross. It was claimed that only two pure bred flocks remained uncontaminated with the Saxony merinos. Whether this claim was merely for speculative purposes, as we are led now to suspect, is of small importance since the demand far exceeded the supply, and prices were very extravagant for sheep of unquestioned purity of blood. This stimulated the improvement of flocks, and it was not long before the merit of American bred Spanish merino sheep entitled them to the name of American merino sheep, and they are still known by this cognomen everywhere, the world over.

In the meantime the Saxony sheep had a few friends in Washington county, Pennsylvania, in contiguous parts of West Virginia and on the opposite side of the river in Ohio. These gentlemen were well qualified for the charge of these Electoral sheep. In 1884 they organized the National Improved Saxony Sheep Breeders' Association and issued their first register. There were scarcely more than one thousand one hundred of this breed entitled to a place in the book of record. "The aim has been to breed a large, well-formed, vigorous sheep, and at the same time retain the beautiful, white, crimpy wool of the Saxony." Still continuing to quote from their book: "By long perseverance we have secured our object, and we now consider the improved Saxony an established breed, producing with great regularity lambs of the highest order, both in regard to fleece and body. The object of our society is not to get up a 'boom,' to use the favorite expression of the day, in order that prices of stock may be inflated above value, but our design is to preserve our blood pure that we may continue to improve and go on as near to perfection as possible." It was a matter of surprise and regret that these sheep were not exhibited at the World's Columbian Exposition. The plump, round forms, without wrinkles, short, well-set necks of these sheep, standing on short, straight, strong legs with well-shaped feet, with wool grading XXX, or above, long, white, dense, crimpy, free from curly spots on top of shoulders or back, and extending evenly over the whole body," would have been of no ordinary interest to visitors, especially the foreign wool experts, who were there to see what Americans were doing in fine wool growing.

While Saxony flocks are not being increased in this country, it is just to say that the few who remain steadfast are doing as well as anybody in the sheep business, and expect to continue to breed and improve their flocks as long as they live. Their fleeces find a special demand and at high prices, which justifies the raising, and when they put their wethers on the market they bring quite fancy prices. Nor are the weights by any means inconsiderable as compared with other breeds of sheep. Whether in the course of time as the evolutions of agriculture and sheep husbandry go on, the Saxony sheep will be extensively disfeminated, remains to be seen. This breed is gradually decreasing in Germany, being supplanted by mutton breeds, which gives an expectation that some day there shall be an under supply of this most estimable grade of wool.

CLOSING THE HOUSE.

Before closing the city house for the warm season a thorough ventilation should take place, so thorough that good air may penetrate to the darkest recesses. Corners should be left as clean as centers, plumbing as carefully scrubbed as though occupancy were to continue, and every room left with ventilation of outside air through the whole season.

The kitchen and cellar should be especially cleaned and renovated, and let it be said right here that to clean a cellar is not merely to sweep the floor clean and pack rubbish away under stairs. It means to unearth every nook and corner, lift every box and board, wash out and off old dust-covered bottles and various utensils if they are to be kept (better still to throw away everything not expected to be needed in a reasonable length of time), and the whole place to be whitewashed with good lime. This sends a sweet, clean air through the house, and is a better beginning than doing up the parlor curtains or having the furniture shrouded in linen. The back yards should be freed of old plants and rubbish. Don't throw old pieces of carpet and oil cloth out in the court that not you, but your less fortunate nieghbors, have got to look at all summer.

This cleaning and clearing are better done at the closing than at the opening of the housekeeping year, if only one scouring is permitted. It is a selfish policy which reasons that, as there must be an autumn cleaning, the spring renovation may be slighted, since it will have to be done again. There is a menace to health in a house closed up and left with all the winter's effluvia and dust generating microbes by the heat of the summer's sun.—New York Times.

THIS WAS A PROFANE PARROT.

The stock of parrot stories has nearly been exhausted, but here is one from South McAlester, Tex., which has the merit of being true as well as amusing. Mrs. Strother made her home at the hotel of the town and was the owner of the bird in question. In the early spring, before the screens were put in her windows, the lady wished to expel the mosquitoes that the mild winter had not succeeded in killing out, and for this purpose she kindled a fire in her rooms, burning a little sulphur in the grate to aid in getting rid of the pest. Leaving the apartments closely shut up to prevent the smoke from escaping before it had done its work, she forgot to remove the parrot, who was dignified by the name of George.

The guests were at dinner, when they were startled by shrieks and yells—"Oh, Strother! Lord God! Lord God! Strother, Lord God!" and thinking some person in desperate extremity the entire party rushed up the stairs, and directed by the cries, which waxed louder and more appealing, were about to break down the door of the room from which they proceeded. But George's mistress had recognized the voice, and unlocked the door, liberating the poor parrot, which, with his wings spread, was down on the floor, close to the sill, uttering his cry of "Strother! Lord God! Lord God!" As the door opened the bird, still spreading his wings, in terror went skimming down the stairs, out of the hotel and through the startled town, calling still, "Strother, Lord God! Lord God!" not able to fly high, but getting on as fast as possible. Although captured and brought back, it was some days before he could be gotten up the stairs again, but when he was again brought into the room where he had been so nearly suffocated he looked about it for a moment, then said, "What a h—l of a smell!"

SHE APOLOGIZED.

A little girl who had a foolish habit of plain-speaking, was taken to the sewing-circle with her mother. On entering the room, after exchanging greetings with several matrons of her acquaintance, Miss Truthful walked up to another lady, and in the confident tone of one who gives utterance to a self-evident fact, she said, loudly enough for everyone present to hear:

"Why, Mrs. Handley, how homley you are!"

While the victim was hiding her confusion as best she might, and the rest were trying hard to conceal their amusement, the young lady herself was hastily taken from the room. Once in the hall she was dealt with somewhat severely, and made to feel the enormity of her unintentional rudeness. Then she was taken back to apologize. Walking straight up to Mrs. Handley, while all the ladies held their breath to listen, she said, with trembling tones, and with the tears still upon her cheeks:

"Mrs. Handley, I'm sorry you're so homely!"—Youth's Companion.

Baron Wissman, the African explorer, was married at Cologne, Germany, the other day, to Miss Hedwig Lingen. The father of the bride is a wealthy manufacturer. It is understood that Major Wissman will leave the German colonial service.

The dispatches say that it is probable that the Czarina will later accompany her father, the King of Denmark, to her girlhood's home. After living among terrors for so long there must be need of a season of peace for the ex-Empress of the Russias.

THE SHADOWY DEEP.

The Silent Aisles of the Ocean Recesses.

A TRIP TO THE BOTTOM OF THE SEA.

Beaten by a Constant Storm of Shells. Green and Violet Monsters of the Ocean Bed.

The ocean, which has so long been a mystery even to those who live on its borders, is gradually giving up its secrets, and the seemingly inexplicable contradictions are becoming more and more understood.

To the layman, the reader who has not followed the investigations of students of the deep sea, it is difficult to realize how life can exist where the pressure is so great that it is compared to a train of cars loaded with pig-iron tearing down upon a man's shoulders, or many tons to the square inch. Neither are the conditions of life readily understood at a depth where a ray of sunlight never has reached, where eternal night apparently reigns; where the temperature is nearly at the freezing point, and where in all probability a silence so profound exists that a sound has never broken the quiet of ages.

The deep sea, while forbidding and uninviting, has its inhabitants that are well adapted to the strange conditions within its borders, where eternal darkness was supposed to reign. We have every reason to believe that there is at times a wonderful assembling of light-givers, who illumine the dark, unfathomed caves of the ocean and change its abysmal regions into scenes of weird splendor.

If the ocean bed, which is popularly supposed to occupy three-fourths of the world's surface, should suddenly be laid bare we should in the main find a duplicate of terrestrial conditions.

To make the ocean bed a reality I will ask the reader to imagine that he is equipped with a diver's armor capable of resisting pressure, and accompany me into the deep sea. As we descend into the blue depths we realize that we have entered another world, where to all intents and purposes water is the atmosphere. If we entered the ocean on the Pacific Coast from the beach we would gradually walk down an easy descent for many miles, and the same is true of the Atlantic. Almost immediately the light fades, so that when at a depth of five hundred feet it is comparatively dark and intensely cold. Deeper we descend, the sunlight gradually fading until, at a depth of a quarter of a mile, the darkness is intense so far as the sun is concerned.

In shallow water we have passed through the region of abundant life. Along the shore are schools of porpoises, immense whales that occasionally venture far below the surface, and a number of air-breathing fish-like animals that are kept near the surface by their structure and requirements. Here are schools of fish—salmon and sardines—and passing is a migrating herd of seal.

Deeper we pass and leave them behind, descending to a depth of 1,500 feet in darkness profound. An electric light would show a singular change. Many of the fish are of gay colors, and could we whisk one to the surface its eyes would be popping from its head when it arrived from the sudden change.

Strange animals inhabit this region, and the deeper we go the more remarkable they appear, and finally at a mile or so they fairly compel our admiration. Here are scarlet scrimps; crabs on stilt-like legs; others that are blind; more that carry their own lights, for long ago we saw living stars, moons and comets in this abysmal region that serve a variety of purposes in the economy of nature. Everywhere there is life. Every drop of water is alive; and standing in this strange region, at a depth of a mile or so, we find ourselves in a rainstorm beneath the sea. All about are countless objects dropping upon us, invisible to the eye, but so result-producing in the aggregate that the raindrops pile and heap up in such masses that with those that die on the bottom they round off the tops of submarine hills and mountains, fill up the valleys, and the thick gelatinous ooze through which we have walked with so much difficulty is the visible result of the rain. In brief, we are in the region of the globigerina ooze—a condition found in great depths, but not always in the greatest. It has been estimated that if lime-secreting organisms are as numerous down to a depth of six hundred feet as they are near the surface there would be more than sixteen tons of calcareous shells or carbonate of lime in the uppermost one hundred fathoms of every square mile of the ocean.

The rainstorm is the falling of these countless shells to the bottom. They are ever dying; the animal is destroyed, and the little shell sinks, piling up at the bottom and forming the well-known globigerina ooze. The increasing weight grinds up the lower stratum into an impalpable powder, and slowly piles up the bottom, forming a mass which if elevated above the surface would resemble the chalk cliffs of Dover, which were formed at the bottom of the ocean in much the same way.

Assuming that we are walking on the ocean bottom at the depth of over a mile, we move cautiously along in water icy cold, and suddenly are confronted with a blaze of light, and find ourselves in a field of light-givers. Imagine a corn-field with stalks from two to four feet in height, the tips gleaming with light and waving gently to and fro. Such an appearance the fields of umbellulaira present.

Above the forest of living lights strange and weird fishes are passing, which we recognize as forms that have been dredged from great depths by the "Albatros" "Chall nger" and others. One, the Chiasmodon, dashes by emitting light from its own body, and wonder of wonders! we see it seize a fish five times its own bulk and draw itse over it like a glove. Its jaws by special arrangement separate, and the mouth a cavern of India-rubber-like possibilities. In all probability the largest and most remarkable fishes have not been seen, and escape the dredge. Many of these strange forms of the abyssal depths are types of extinct forms, and we can only imagine what wonders the deep sea hides. In the Altantic and Pacific gigantic squids from fifty to seventy feet in length are found, and glimpses of strange snake or eel-like sharks are suggestive of the uncaught mysteries and unseen dwellers in the deep sea. Among the curious light-givers is a shark which was caught by Dr. Bennett. It was perfectly black, but emitted a strange phosphorescent light which remained some time after the animal's death. The shark was placed in a jar in the cabin of the vessel, and is described as presenting a ghostly appearance, emitting a rich green light almost sufficient to read by.

Other forms—huge disks are the moons and lesser planets of this submarine world of space. The variety of tints and colors emitted by the jelly-fishes is almost beyond comprehension, and so diverse are the lights that the belief is forced upon the beholder that they have some marked significance in the economy of nature. One known as Lucernaria emits a pale bluish light all over its surface. Obelia has a luminous stem alone. Cestus, or the Girdle of Venus, has a yellow light. Idyia emits roseate hues, while the light of Aurelia is of such brilliant yellow that when one of the animals was squeezed into a glass of milk, the latter was rendered so luminous that a letter was read by it.

From these instances, and they are but a few in many, it is evident that the stroller through the ocean, either in the moderate depths at night or the abyssal realms of day, would not wander about blindly, but would have his pathway illumined by lights effective and brilliant, rendering the deepest ocean a region the opposite of the conditions of stygian darkness that it is erroneously supposed to hold.—Charles F. Holder, in Mail and Express.

THE LEGENDS OF AUTUMN LEAVES.

Many women returning from the mountains have brought with them great quantities of autumn leaves, both from trees and certain vines whose leaves take on the autumn tints. When asked why they had taken the trouble to bring the leaves from such distances as they have in many cases the answer came: "Oh, you know they will make such pretty decorations at Chirstmas." There are many beautiful legends connected with the foliage of the dying year. The Choctaw Indians believed that the stars in the Great Dipper were men hunting. Their traditions say that they began the chase early in the spring and it lasted all summer. But in the autumn the hunters succeeded in wounding the Great Bear, and his blood, dripping upon the leaves, dyed them crimson. Our custom of using evergreens at Christmas came from the Druids, who thought that in taking the mistletoe and holly into their houses they were introducing the good spirits who gave them luck. Surely it is a pretty thing for our women to garner up the treasures they gather in the fall, the beautiful leaves and curious cones and bunches of grasses and velvety bull-rushes, for do not they help to bring the fairies of pleasant thought into our homes? Perhaps the old Britons were not so far wrong, after all.

PONCE, PUERTO RICO.

A Most Populous Island Throbbing With Industry.

WHERE PLANTATIONS FLOURISH.

Although you may make the circuit of Puerto Rico by the newly completed railroad, and visit several interior cities by the various branch lines, it is infinitely pleasanter, if time is not pressing, to travel over any of these tropical islands on horseback. Nothing more delightful can be imagined than a saddle journey from San Juan Bautista, the capital, to Ponce, on the other side of the island, a distance of thirty miles as the crows flies, but nearer fifty by the old Camino Real, or royal road, which Ponce de Leon constructed.

The interior of Puerto Rico is exceedingly beautiful, and so fertile and well tilled that the entire island looks like a continuous garden. The comparatively level strip between the highlands and the sea, from three to five miles wide, is full of coffee groves, cotton, cane, and tobacco fields. Then comes a mass of irregular hills, ranging east and west, culminating in cloud-capped Yunque, their upper heights yet covered with magnificent forests. Flourishing plantations extend a long way up the sloping hillsides and down into the green valleys between them, and in hundreds of narrow canyons flocks and herds find richest pasturaeg. Every wall and hedgerow is overrun with roses and blossoming creepers, and every spot not devoted to articfiial crops is covered with flowers, such as are carefully tended in northern conservatories, here growing in wild odorous profusion. On the higher grounds European corn and vegetables are cultivated, and between the plantations and the sturdy line of ancient trees—which stand out in the landscape like a ruff around the neck of the topmost peaks—rice is grown, of a mountain variety that does not need flooding and constitutes the staff of life of the laboring classes.

Enough is left of the primeval forest to show what it must have been when Columbus found it, then extending down to the edge of the sea. Graceful palms of many varieties raise their plumed heads high above the dense underwood, the white blossoms for "sabinos" perfume the air, and in solitudes made moist and sweet by some dancing cataract gigantic tree-ferns shoot up fronds twenty and thirty feet long, but as delicately outlined as the smallest variety. Another conspicuous tree which stands in extensive groves, called "ortegon" by the natives (the cocoloba macrophylla, I believe), has purple spikes a yard long; and lower down the curious "shore grape," climbing everywhere, hides tapering spires of pale-green fruit under its dark velvet leaves, each with a crimson midrib, which overlap one another like the tiles on a roof.

You are perpetually crossing little streams that make great noise and flurry in their short dash from the hills to the sea—sometimes over rustic bridges, but oftener by fording. There are said to be no fewer than 1,300 rivers in this small island, at least fifty of them navigable to the foot of the mountains. The entire coast is indented with a succession of deep bays and navigable lagoons, some of the latter several miles long and extending far inland. They serve admirably for bringing down the products of interior estates in the small sloops of the planters, but have lured many larger ships to destruction by the treacherous ground-seas which at certain seasons beat against the cliffs with tremendous violence.

You are impressed by the prosperous look of this Spanish colony, and by the plainly apparent fact that affairs in general are in much more satisfactory condition here than in almost any other island of the great archipelago.

Though Puerto is only one-twelfth the size of Cuba (3,550 square miles), it contains fully half the population of Cuba—every acre being occupied and cultivated, without overcrowding, and without the overwhelming majority of blacks that you find in most of the Antilles. The negroes are numerous enough in Puerto Rico—about one-third of the population; but that is better than in some of the loveliest of these sea-girt Edens, where hardly a white face is to be seen. Soon after slavery was abolished by the Spanish crown (in 1873) it was officially stated that out of Puerto Rico's 807,708 inhabitants there were 700,000 adults who could neither read nor write. Thereupon the government bestirred itself to forward the too long neglected cause of education by establishing a great many free schools and compelling all children under a given age, regardless of color or "previous condition," to attend them. To-day there are 557 of these government primary schools, besides others for secondary and higher instruction, and the statisticians of the next generation will be able to make a far more crreditable showing.

The lines of cast and color appear to be rather loosely drawn among the Porto Riquanos (pronounced Por-to Ree-kan-yose), as the native inhabitants are collectively called. The small landowners, day laborers, and country people, are mostly of a curious old Spanish stock largely modified by Indian blood, and are distinguished from the negro and Saxon admixtures by the same name of Gibaros. There is a strong feeling in Puerto Rico against any immigration of laborers, whether of Chinese, coolies, or Europeans—and goodness knows there are already enough hewers of wood and drawers of water among the lately emancipated negroes. It is amusing to read the unflattering accounts which Carl Mauch, the celebrated German explorer, who crossed the island on foot a few years ago in search of botanical specimens, gives of the female Porto Riquanos. As in many other parts of Spanish America, walking is looked upon as a disgraceful method of locomotion—where even beggars may ride and the poorest darkey owns a lean donkey or scrubby little island pony. So the women of the rural districts ridiculed Mauch when he came tramping by, covered with dust and perspiration, in dilligent search after things which to them are utterly worthless, and they regarded him as a sort of harmless lunatic and a proper butt for jokes. But the scientist took it greatly to heart and retaliated with a will in his quaint book.

He says that the ladies of Pueto Rico sit all day on their housetops but partially draped in white raiment, sheltering their half-naked bodies from the scorching rays of the sun with parasols, meanwhile rolling the stumps of cigars from one corner of the mouth to the other, gossiping with their neighbors on adjacent housetops, and flirting with admirers on the street below; or else they loll in hammocks hung in their doorways, chewing tobacco and squirting brown saliva between their discolored teeth. "These ladies," he adds, "make life an easy time, spent in sleeping, smoking, eating, riding in rickety chaises, or doing absolutely nothing but growing fatter and fatter." Remembering the sensitive author's irritation, these statement should be taken cum grano.

It is true that the ladies of the cities have the pleasant Spanish custom of sitting on the flat tops of their casas in the cool of the day, as do their sisters in Argentina Peru, Mexico and many other parts of Hispano-America; but it would be hardly possible for dames of the rural districts in Puerto Rico to follow that fashion on their steep-pitched, straw-thatched roofs. It is also true that, as among all Latin peoples, a long midday siesta is universally taken, and the lazy hammock claims a large share of everybody's time, both rich and poor.

I have never seen a tobacco-chewing lady, but many women of the lower clsses are offensively addicted to smoking—not the dainty corn-husk cigarettes that find favor with Mexican ladies, but great coarse cigars of strong tobacco, such as the women of Paraguay smoke. But, despite their little idiosyncrasies, the Porto Riquanos are consistent church-goers and excellent wives and mothers in their way.

Forty years ago it was believed that not a single trace remained of the original inhabitants, who were 700,000 strong when Ponce de Leon came to their subjugation, until a party of Yankee clergymen and college professors, out on a vacation, made a walking tour of Puerto Rico in search of relics. They made an interesting archaelogical collection, mainly of stone knives, axes, spear heads and arrow points rude pottery and clay images, which was afterward divided between the Smithsoinan Institution in Washington and the Ethnological Museum in Dublin. We made a detour of several miles from the main road to see a curious stone monument, whose original purpose nobody now living can determine. It stands a little way from the village of Guraba, on the right bank of the Rio Grande de Loiza. The upper surface is carved with strange designs, and on one side appear hieroglyphics wonderfully like the Egyptian.

Ponce, the largest city of Puerto Rico, has a population of about 38,000, and lies midway on the south coast—or rather three miles inland, in the center of the sugar district. It is a rich old town—clean, healthful and well built. Its dwelling houses are all wood, with iron balconies, green jalousies and windows without glass, and its public buildings are of brick and stone. Most of the latter are grouped around the palm-shaded plaza, and include a town hall, theater, clubhouse, Roman Catholic cathedral, and English Episcopal church. There are half a dozen other churches of various denominations, a well-kept hospital, public library, and reading-room, two colleges, and a military school. The wide, well-paved streets have been recently lighted with gas by an English company. The next town in point of population, San Germain, has about thirty thousand inhabitants. Mayaguez, on the west coast, has something over twelve thousand, and is worth a visit. It is a garrison town, and has clubs and gas works, and the only tolerable hotel on the island. A fine iron bridge, recently completed, connects the town with its port; but unfortunately the harbor is accessible only to vessels drawing less than sixteen feet. Puerto Rico is divided into eight "departments"—the smallest being the tiny island of Vieques, which has a population of 6,000 and is used as a military penal station. Its town is named Isabel Segunda. There are several other villages of some consequence—Guayama, Arecibo, Humacao, etc.—but we had not time to visit them.—Fannie B. Ward, in Inter-Ocean.

Charles Perry murdered Patrick McNamara in Lava, Bannock county, Idaho, and hid the money he secured, $75. He employed Ted Smith, an Idaho Falls lawyer, to defend him. In some way it was learned that Smith knew where the money was hidden and that he was going to get it, so he was watched and detected while digging up the money. This was put in evidence, but it was contended that Smith's action was a breach of confidence with his client and the testimony should not have been admitted.

BUYING A FARM.

There are Many Things to be Considered.

EASY TO BUY, BUT HARD TO SELL.

Better Buy a Few Acres at a High Price Than Many Acres at a Low Price.

In selecting a farm, especially if the owner intends to reside upon it, there are many things to be considered aside from its actual commercial value. Whether he intends to live upon it or not, he should take into consideration not only the quality of the soil and its adaptability to the proposed purposes, but also its nearness to market, the state of the roads over which his produce will have to be drawn, perhaps in early spring or late fall, the condition of the fences, buildings and the natural drainage. All these go far toward making a desirable or undesirable purchase, for a farm is a piece of property of which one cannot dispose whenever he may choose. Once bought, it is much more easily sold again if it is a desirable piece of land. In addition to these, if the farm is to be the purchaser's residence, he will take into consideration its distance from school and church privileges. For a family of small children, it is very desirable to have the schoolhouse within a mile at most. This feature alone would be worth hundreds of dollars in the value of a farm to some buyers. Muddy roads and bad weather are unavoidable for a portion of the year, and convenience to the schoolhouse is very desirable.

While the dwelling house and other buildings are important matters in a farm home, do not forget that a dooryard shaded with trees cannot be supplied to order as they can. Be sure that at least a few trees are ready to furnish the ever welcome shade about the house in summer. However carefully planted and tended, they will require years of growth before they afford much shade. A farmhouse with shade trees of good growth in the front yard is a more desirable residence than one left to the scorching rays of a summer sun. It is a common saying that one can buy a farm with suitable buildings on it cheaper than the land could be bought, and the buildings added. This may be true, but remember no money can give shade trees within a year or two. It is much pleasanter to have a porous soil in the dooryard than one which holds water like a sponge. A good orchard is worth a great deal to a farm. As with shade trees, they may be set out, but it takes ten years at least for an apple tree to attain bearing age. No one can afford to wait ten years for apples. It is better to buy a farm with even a few apple trees than without any.

A farm on which there is no waste land is to be preferred to one of which a portion is untillable. River flats or low borders of any smaller stream are usually wet and fit only for pasture. Marsh grass and rushes are the best of their productions, and the pasturage even is not equal, acre for acre, to good upland. Such a stream is excellent in time of drouth to supply water for the stock, but it makes a good deal of waste land which might better be under cultivation. A swamp, or swale may be cleared up, if there is an outlet for drainage, and often makes the choicest land when so treated. A beautiful farm home is within the reach of many a family who think that because they have not plenty of money to spend in beautifying it, they cannot have it. Fixing up and keeping everything tidy about the place, fences in good repair and free from bushes, shade trees scattered about, a well-kept lawn, barns in good repair, whether they are expensive or not, all these cost nothing but a little time, and add more to a farm home than most owners realize. One who rides about the country, where he is unacquainted, can judge pretty closely of the ability of the farmers by the appearance of their farms. If one wants to sell, the more attractive his farm is the more readily can a buyer be found. In buying a farm, as in buying anything else, the best may be the cheapest in the end. A few dollars more on an acre may put the purchaser in possession of a farm more desirable in every way. In that case, the best is certainly the cheapest. No one ought to buy a farm that is to be his home without giving the matter sufficient thought and personal observation of all its various conditions. — American Agriculturist.

A SELFISH WORLD.

George—"No matter how things go, the poor always suffer."

Jack—"Yes, the nabobs who own railroads think nothing of running over a poor man's horse."

"Yes, and the man who can afford to own a horse runs down a poor fellow on a bicycle."

"Just so! And the fellow on the bicycle runs down the poor chap who has to walk."

"That's it! And the man who walks stumbles against the cripple who goes on crutches."

"That's the way! And the cripple on crutches spends most of his time jamming his sticks on other people's corns. It's really a selfish world!"

In politics the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky is like unto Mephistopheles, and fame is the reward of politicians who crook the pregnant hinges of the knee and do the bidding of Huntington. Woe to the office seeker, however, who disregards the mandate of the master, for the giant monopoly never forgets a wrong nor forgives what it terms an injury. This spirit is manifested in the combination that is being formed by the railroad to defeat George C. Perkins for the United States senate. When Mr. Perkins was sent to Washington to fill the unexpired term of the late Senator Stanford he made a study of the proposed railroad legislation. Among other matters he looked into Huntington's pet measure, the Reilly funding bill. It did not take the Californian, who is familiar with the railroad system on this coast, long to realize the injustice of the bill, and in much shorter order he denounced the measure. George C. Perkins is not the sort of man to enact the role of Faust to Huntington's Mephistopheles. Hence, he is under the ban, and the Southern Pacific will leave nothing undone to prevent Mr. Perkins from being returned to the senate. Will the legislature submit to Mr. Huntington's dictation?

Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire has introduced a resolution in favor of inviting political union of the United States and Canada, which sets forth with much force and clearness the advantages that would result to both countries, political, industrial and commercial. It is only a little while since this distinguished statesman and all others belonging to his party were vociferous, if not eloquent, in describing the disasters that would result to the people of the United States if they were permitted unrestricted commercial intercourse with the people of Canada. It is plain that the evil results that were foretold as sure to come in case trade should be made free with Canada would be very much aggravated if Canada were made a part of the United States. Great is the humbug of protection!

The people of Sacramento are getting tired of unpunished crime, and the Spirit of Judge Lynch is hovering in the air. But they should look to their votes better and be careful not to let the excitement of the hour run away with their better judgment. There are but few cases in the world which will warrant lynching, and there are none in a free land where the governing power is vested in the people. The people should make their laws, abide by them and see them enforced. No lynch laws are needed in America. Of all the crimes against each other lynching is the most terrible, because it is an over riding of all law and order, and that, too, by the law making power.

The Los Angeles Herald of Saturday gave nine colums of interviews with business men on the matter of building a road from the San Juaquin valley into that growing city. It is evident that the proposition is well received by the business men there. What is needed now is to crystallize some of the enthusiasm into action and organization, to promote the mutual interests of the upper San Joaquin valley and that part of the State south of Tehachapi.

The declaration of a number of Sacramento's committee of safety thai the first burglar who falls into their hands will be lynched does not tend to strengthen public confidence in the committee It was generally supposed that the committee was organized to prevent crime—not to commit it.

THE SLANG OF LONDON

ITS RHYMING FEATURE, WHICH IS PECULIAR TO ENGLAND.

Say "Daisies" For Boots, and You Will Have Made a Good Start, but That Is Not All of It by Any Means—A Dissertation on an Unknown Science.

By way of introducing the subject let me premise that there is a certain school of thinkers—dwellers for the most part in very unfashionable districts of London—who hold that a policeman in plain clothes, dress he ever so plainly, may always be known as such by a cursory inspection of his boots. Whether this opinion is well founded I know not, but its existence, and also the existence of rhyming slang, was brought to my notice not long ago in Oxford street—not the Oxford street of west enders and De Quincey, but Oxford street "out Stepney way." I happened to be rather stoutly shod, and I wear spectacles, which are, I suppose, often assumed for the purpose of disguise, and as I passed by a group of ill favored loiterers at a street corner I distinctly heard one of them remark to another: "'Ere's a tec. D'yer dick 'is goggles and 'is blanky daisies?"

I walked quickly away, but the words remained in my mind. The opinion they conveyed, except as affording proof that the speaker belonged to the school of thinkers above alluded to, did not interest me so much as the words themselves. "Tec" is of course merely an abbreviation for "detective." Much might be written about "dick." It is pure Romany, connected, as every student of that attractive language knows, with the Sanskrit "drish" and the Hindoostanee "dekhno," meaning "to see." But "daisies"—being the slang term and, as I shall show, the rhyming slang term for "boots"—is a good specimen of a most singular perversion of the English language, which is well worth the attention of any one who cares about linguistic oddities.

Rhyming slang is peculiar to England and, I believe, to London. The French language, so rich in slang, does not admit of such treatment. It is of modern origin, and I doubt if any trace of it is to be found in the records, which are fairly plentiful, of the slang of last century. Nor do I recollect any instance of its appearance in the works of Dickens, Harrison Ainsworth or Bulwer Lytton.

Rhyming slang expressions may be divided into two classes—the simple and the complex. The simple method consists in substituting for a word some other word or phrase which rhymes with it. Not that every one is free to choose his own rhymes. Usage has established certain rhyming slang equivalents for certain words, and, although no doubt new rhymes are always being introduced on trial, yet when one has become recognized as belonging to the dialect it can never be dislodged. For instance, the rhyming slang for "a pocket" is "skyrocket," and neither "locket" nor "socket" would be tolerated. The eyes are "mince pies;" the ear and the nose are, oddly enough, the "frosty and clear" and the "I suppose." How, when and why these particular rhymes were universally adopted will never be known. As Professor Dowden remarks in connection with a very different subject, "To the eyes of no diver amid the wrecks of time will that curious talisman gleam." Who was "Charlie Prescott," whose name is immortalized as a synonym for "waistcoat?" And why should coat and trousers be concealed under such circumstances as "I'm afloat" and "round the 'ouses?"

Other examples of what I have called the simple form of rhyming slang are "cat and mouse" (house), "elephant's trunk" (drunk), "bull and cow" (row), and "I'm so frisky" (whisky). But if I am asked how "daisies" can be the rhyming slang for "boots" I answer that we have here an example of the second or complex form of the jargon, which finds its highest development in the mouths of experts. Having got your rhyme—say, "skyrocket" for "pocket"—you are permitted, within certain ill defined limits, to make your slang equivalent shorter and more occult by omitting the rhyming portion. Thus "pocket" becomes "sky" and "daisy roots," the simple or first standard form for "boots," is contracted into "daisies." In the same way no master of the language would ever give brandy or gin their primitive names, "Jack the dandy" or "Brian O'Lynn." The one is always referred to as "Jack," the other as "Brian." It will be seen that words treated in this way must have a tendency, in constant use, to lose sight, as it were, of their original forms and to become merged in the great mass of ordinary prosaic slang. For instance, in act 1, scene 1, of "The Cotton King" some one says that somebody has "a streak of black across the chivvy." An Adelphi audience knows, of course, that "chivvy" means "face," but the earlier form of the word, "chevy chase," being now rarely if ever used, the rhyming original is probably known to few playgoers, and the word "chivvy" is thus in danger of being left with no more poetry about it than is attached to such terms as "conk" or "boko," the ordinary slang for nose.

We hear a great deal about the way in which slang has invaded our conversation and our literature; but, in spite of the recent popularization of the coster, I doubt if much rhyming slang is heard in west end drawing rooms. And I have only come across one example of its employment, except occasionally in a music hall song, in what might be called a literary form. There is a poem which begins thus, and readers who have followed me so far will find no difficulty in translating it:

I was sitting one night at the Anna Maria,
Warming my plates of meat,
When there came a knock at the Rory O'Moore
Which made my raspberry beat.

This opening makes one wish for more, but I am sorry to say that I can only recollect the first stanza.—Pall Mall Budget.

CHANGING PIANISTS.

An Incidental Performance That Proved Interesting.

"As interesting as anything I've seen in this town," said a visitor to the city, "was a change of pianists that I saw in a variety theater. There was a man on the stage singing a song, and the pianist was playing the accompaniment. I happened to see the pianist glancing to the left once, and I looked in that direction myself and saw coming down the aisle a man that I judged must be the relief pianist, and so he was. I imagined that he would sit down for a moment and wait, but, dear me, I was very slow.

"He was approaching the piano at the bass end of the keyboard. When he had almost reached the corner of the piano, the man who was playing began gently sliding off the seat to the right, still playing. By this time the relief was abreast of the bass keys, and these the first player, who was still sliding steadily to the right, now relinquished to him, and then the newcomer, still standing, but also moving steadily to the right, struck in in perfect time and tune.

"There was a brief time, a second or two, when both men were playing—the retiring pianist the treble and the oncoming player the bass—and for a fraction of a second they were both standing. But now the new player is fairly opposite the center of the keyboard. He settles into the seat, and now it is his hand that strikes the treble, and now the whole piano resounds to his resolute touch.

"In fact, there never was a minute when the piano had anything to say about it. There never was a minute when the men were not completely masters of the situation. There never was an instant from the time the relief approached until he was firmly settled in his seat when both men were not continuously in motion, but the change was made without a jar or a slur in the music and without the omission of a note."—New York Sun.

A Royal Book Buyer.

Empress Catherine II of Russia was a great reader and a lover of books. One of her services to letters in Russia was the purchase of the libraries of Voltaire and Diderot. She was a warm friend and admirer of these French philosophers, and their work interested her because she was eager to learn new theories of politics and government. Voltaire's library of about 7,000 volumes is now a part of the Russian imperial library in the Hermitage palace, and in the hall devoted to it is Houdon's statue of Voltaire.

The story of Catherine's purchase of Diderot's library is interesting. It is creditable to her tact and her generosity. Diderot named £15,000 as the price of his library. Catherine II offered him £16,000 and named as a condition of the bargain that her purchase should remain with Diderot until his death. Thus Diderot, without leaving Paris, became Catherine's librarian in his own library. As her librarian he was given a yearly salary of £1,000.

One year this salary was not paid. Then Catherine wrote to her librarian that she could not have him or her library suffer through the negligence of a treasurer's clerk, and that she should send him the sum that she had set aside for the care and increase of her library for 50 years. At the end of that period she would make new arrangements. A check for £25,000 accompanied this letter.—Youth's Companion.

Children's Letters.

A little boy who in the absence of his parents had been sentenced to go to bed early by a relative was seen to be busy with a pencil and paper, after which he carefully buried the communication in a hole in the garden and retired to bed. The missive when disinterred ran as follows:

DEAR MR. DEVIL—Please come and take Aunt Jane. Please be quick. Yours, ROBERT.

It is to be regretted that not a single letter by a Roman or a Greek child survives, the nearest approach being, perhaps, some verses written by a child of 10 in the later empire, which his parents had engraved upon his tomb two years later. The ancients doted on their children. Catullus wrote an ode to his daughter's sparrow, Ovid to his children's parrot, and the Greeks wrote epigrams to their children's toys. They even made offerings of toys to their dead children for playthings in the world of spirits. But no voice of a Greek child comes to us across the gulf of time.—London Spectator.

"The Lost Continent."

Dr. Bowdler Sharpe, the well known ornithologist of the British museum, delivered a lecture at the Savage club on "The Lost Continent." Dr. Sharpe first illustrated the zoo geographical regions of the world, with their peculiar forms of bird life, and explained the occurrence of isolated forms in different portions of the globe by the existence of a former land connection now vanished beneath the sea. The idea of an ancient tropical continent at the south pole uniting South America, Madagascar and Australia is arousing considerable interest and discussion in scientific circles at the present time, chiefly owing to the support which it has received from the recent discoveries in the Chatham islands of Mr. H. O. Forbes, the well known Malayan traveler. The lecturer in conclusion dealt with some problems of the geographical distribution of birds for which no reasonable solution has yet been offered.—St. James Gazette.

Sweetheart Abbey.

There is in Galloway, Scotland, an ancient ruin known as Sweetheart abbey. Within its ivy covered, storm battered walls lies buried the affectionate and devoted Dervorgill, with the heart of her husband, John Baliol, embalmed upon her breast. Lovely in their lives, in death they are not divided. The crumbling masonry is still and must ever be a romance in its symbols of death and decay, telling every day, as it has for 600 years, the thrilling story of a woman's tender love and devotion.

A Misapplied Text.

The October brew of homemade beer was the celebrated one in Bucks, and the farmer made it of sufficient strength by means of eight bushels of malt to the hogshead of 54 imperial gallons. Once, in an outlying village in Bucks, the rector on a certain Sunday gave out as the text, "First Hebrews, 9 and 10," Whereupon an old fashioned farmer, renowned for his good tap, called out: "And a very pretty tipple too. I brews eight!"—San Francisco Argonaut.

EAT, DRINK AND BE MERRY.

Another one of our cherished ideas has been ruthlessly destroyed and at the hands of bacilli breeders. It has generally been believed that warm or hot bread was unwholesome, but here comes Dr. Troitzki, a Russian, who says the heat required to bake it kills all the pestiferous bacteria, and so it is inocuous, while bread that is cold or has been cut, is the home of myriads of these wrigglers with unpronounceable names. What will these scientists leave us?

Eat grapes, and enjoy them. The doctors say now that grape seeds cannot be proved to have ever brought on appendicitis.

Here's something new for our surburban householders in the shape of a market basket which will fold up. It is made of wire, covered with cloth and may be slipped into a pocket on the way to town, unfolding its dimensions to hold all kinds of good things on the way home again.

Chocolate lemonade is merely plain lemonade with a heaping teaspoonful of grated chocolate added to each glass.

BARBERS IN BRITAIN.

In Dublin the first-class shops are managed in the same way as the leading shops of London, and most of the first-class journeymen barbers here hail from London and they are paid what are called London wages, that is thirty-five shillings a week, but a barber in order to get those wages must also be a ladies' hair-dresser. The cheaper shops only pay their journeymen from thirteen to twenty shillings a week. The first-class shops charge six pence, that is twelve cents, for shaving and the same price for hair cutting and shampooing. The cheaper shops charge only two pence, or four cents, for shaving, hair cuting or shampooing. Some shops in Cork only charge one penny for each. The first-class shops here turn out a customer just as well as the barbers in America, if not a little better, but I would not let the cheaper barbers shave my dog.

Some of the finest shops in Dublin have our old-fashioned chairs and some have just an upholstered chair with a head-piece attached. The cheap shops most of them just use a wooden chair and the barber wears a dirty apron, but in the finer shops they wear white coats and clean white aprons. London has a great many shops, but there are only a few really good shops. Most of the barber-shops here are called toilet clubs and they are located on the second floor. They get three pence for shaving. The journeymen barbers get about thirty shillings a week; a few get more, but they depend largely on their customers for tips. The best shave I have had in London was in a barber shop conducted by a lady. She employs five other ladies and charges three pence for shaving and a little extra for dressing the hair. There are only about half a dozen shops in London which have modern American chairs.—National Barber.

The debts of the Barings are about settled.

A MOTHER'S SONG.

Hush, my baby, sweetly rest!
Mother's boy feels no alarm;
Pillowed soft upon her breast,
He knows naught of earthly harm.
What though life be dark and sad—
Mother's love can make it glad.

Little child, close to my heart,
See, I press you closer still,
For your dear weight heals its smart—
Even I have known life's ill.
What dream you of tears and sighs
While you gaze in mother's eyes?

Baby mine, my bonny lad,
Do you guess your power, dear?
Earth cannot be dark nor sad
To this heart while you are near.
How can life be aught but sweet,
When child love makes it complete?

AT LONE MOUND.

"Goodby, Hal!" the conductor called from his perch in the turret of the yellow caboose of freight train No. 43.

"Goodby, Abe!" Keanley answered as he trudged along beside the long train toward the small depot beyond the brown water tank. The engine soon slaked its thirst at the tank and got under way again. A moment later the caboose passed Keanley, and with ever increasing speed swayed onward toward the curve at the Lone Mound.

As Keanley neared the little depot, the strains of a violin floated toward him. Soft and sweet came the tune, like the tinkle of musical glasses, and there was in it a pathetic, wailing undertone, as if the player was striving to tell in music of a heartache and trials bravely borne.

Keanley could hardly repress an ejaculation of surprise as he entered the little office and beheld the wielder of the magic bow, a pale faced boy, almost a child. As the lad carefully deposited the violin in the open box at his side and slowly rose, Keanley saw that the little fellow was a cripple. One leg, distorted and shriveled, swung, a useless member. Resting on his crutches, the boy raised his hat.

"You're the new agent, I s'pose," he said.

"Yes," Keanley answered, "I am the new agent. And who are you?" he continued kindly. "The ex-agent?"

"No, only his son," the boy replied.

"And where is your father?"

"Over there on the slope."

The boy's chin quivered as he spoke. Keanley looked from the window. On the slope of the Lone Mound was a tiny graveyard. One oblong black blotch in its midst marked a new made grave. The agent was there.

"Pardon me," Keanley said; "I did not know. My instructions simply told me to take charge of the station. I supposed the agent had been promoted or discharged."

"He was promoted," the boy said gravely.

"And what will you do now?" Keanley asked presently.

"I don't know," the boy answered. "I've been thinking and thinking, but it's no use. I don't know what to do. Perhaps the superintendent will give me a place in an office. I can write a fair hand and wire pretty well, but I ain't much on heavy work."

This last with a rueful look at his crutches.

Then Keanley lied, and deliberately too. He had no need of an assistant, but a lightning resolve flashed through his brain, and he said to the cripple:

"You are just the chap I am looking for. I need a boy to help me."

"What for?" asked the lad.

"To—to—why, to write and look out for things generally," Keanley answered half desperately. "I'll feel safer to gad about when I have an assistant whom I know I can trust. Then, too, I might be sick, you know."

The boy looked doubtfully at him. "If you are in earnest, I'll jump at the chance to stay," he said.

"In earnest?" Keanley cried in pretended pique at the lad's doubt. "Of course I am. Do you think I don't know my own mind, young man?"

The boy said nothing. And so it was settled, and crippled Ben became Keanley's assistant, although there was not work enough to occupy half of one person's time.

As the days when the breeze brought from the slope the perfume of the wild verbenas were succeeded by those when the snow came with a rush and hiss against the little depot Keanley grew more than fond of the little cripple. To be sure, to board and clothe the lad and to pay him an occasional dollar made quite a gap in each month's salary, but Keanley never grudged a penny of it. It was pay enough to witness the boy's gratitude and to see the lad's great eyes following him with their glances of positive beatitude.

Often and often the violin sang its sweet songs, but now they seldom had the pitiful, wailing undertone.

The lad's father had planned to do justice to his talent by having him taught by a master of the violin. Now Keanley and little Ben planned in a happy, visionary way. They were to save what money they could, and thus little Ben was to have the coveted musical instruction. But, at best, the accumulation of funds went on slowly.

The plans of the two went further than this. Keanley had "once upon a time" been foolish enough to fall in love with old Senator Hicks' daughter, and she had returned his love. The old senator, when he found how matters stood, proceeded to squelch the whole affair. He even forgot the time when he had been as much of a pauper as the young fellow he sent packing from his presence.

The girl with her tear wet face upturned to his promised Keanley to wait for him till he succeeded in accumulating the $10,000 that the old senator named as the amount of wealth Keanley must possess before he could aspire to winning her. Then, when orders had sent Keanley to the west he had gone with the determination strong within him to very soon gain the money and the girl.

But he speedily grew despondent. The fates seemed against him. He struck no bonanza or highway to speedy wealth and finally half gave up the struggle. The money that would flow to little Ben as the substantial reward of his genius was to be invested by Keanley, who in this manner, would soon obtain the coveted $10,000. Then when prosperity smiled upon the senator's new found son-in-law little Ben's wealth was to be returned to him. The two plotters placed great faith in this plan, chimerical as it was.

Then came the great storms, and with them one that the "oldest inhabitant," popularly supposed to know everything, declared was the largest and heaviest rainfall since 1831. The creeks seemed to have wholly forgotten their boundaries, and later the work begun by the rain was completed by the cloudburst over in the next county, near the head of Hackberry creek. It was nearly 10 o'clock when a message went clicking by, and Keanley, who had been nursing an aching tooth all day, remarked to Ben, who was playing the violin loudly to shut out the sound of the rushing rain: "Dispatcher is telling them to look out for an east bound special that leaves Hamilton at 10:40. That means 11:26 when it passes here."

Ben nodded and went on with his tune. Presently the train dispatcher was heard calling "G." That was Giddings, the station just beyond, where the railroad bridge spanned Hackberry creek.

"What is the condition of bridge 381?" the message ran.

The operator at Giddings presently clicked back the answer:

"Bridge 381 is O. K. Water high, but not dangerous."

The cloudburst had not yet occurred.

Meanwhile Keanley's tooth grew more painful, till its victim did little but walk the floor and anathematize the offending molar.

"If it doesn't ease up soon," he said presently, "I'll tramp over to the settlement and have it out, storm or no storm."

Soon, the pain not abating, he donned his rubber coat and boots and started away in the darkness and storm.

With his violin for company little Ben scarcely felt lonely. He wondered presently if it were not time for Keanley's return. Suddenly the sender began to click furiously, "H—H—H"—the Hamilton call.

Then came the message:

"Bridge 381 is down. For God's sake, hold the special!"

The cloudburst had done its work. Ben glanced quickly at the clock. The hands indicated a fraction of a minute less than 11:26. The special was on time, and even as Ben turned, there came the flash of the headlight through the storm, that drowned the noise of the engine's approach. No time even to take the red lantern from the cuddy and light it.

Little Ben remembered afterward how, even in the intense excitement of the moment, it had flashed through his mind how useless the effort of the frightened operator at Giddings had been in telegraphing to Hamilton, when he might have known that the special had passed there half an hour before.

The engine gave no call for brakes, and Ben knew that no stop would be made there, and that the train would rush on to destruction at the wrecked bridge at Hackberry creek. The headlight seemed abreast of him as he flung open the door and with a mighty spring on his crutches threw himself out on the platform of the little depot. There was no use or time to signal, and there seemed nothing to do but to let the train rush on to wreck. Then like a flash the little cripple raised his right crutch, and with the rapidity almost of lightning hurled it, lance fashion, at the window of the engine cab just as it flashed past him. Then he slipped and fell headlong on the wet platform.

Passing just above the back of the fireman, as he bent to open the furnace door, the crutch struck the engineer's shoulder with a force that made him cry out. His quick perception took in the situation, and he knew that something serious had caused the train to be signaled in that manner. Soon the train came to a standstill. Then it backed up to the little depot, and the engineer, crutch in hand, descended hurriedly from the cab. He found the owner of the crutch crawling to his feet with a face much paler than usual. The story was soon told, and then it was retold in the parlor car, where the conductor speedily carried little Ben.

In the cab the engineer said to the grimy fireman:

"Bill, it almost makes me ashamed of myself to have my life saved by such a weak, pale little feller, an a cripple at that." Though not numerous the passengers in the parlor car were generous, and the sum of money that they dropped into the hat, passed by a white bearded man whom they called "senator, was a goodly one. Then when little Ben had bashfully expressed his gratitude he asked timidly if any one present could tell him where to go to obtain the coveted musical education. The story of his hopes had to be told, and when he was done the white bearded man cleared his throat in a manner that sounded suspiciously as if he was choking back a sob. Then he took Ben into the little depot and the two talked earnestly together.

When Keanley returned, muddy and wet, but minus the aching tooth, he was astonished to see the special standing in front of the depot, and Senator Hicks and little Ben in earnest conversation in the office. The old senator did not appear to recognize Keanley.

"So you are the agent, young man," he said. "Allow me to congratulate you upon your good judgment in selecting so efficient an assistant. Now let me introduce my recently engaged private secretary, who will accompany me when the special leaves."

The old man laid his hand caressingly on Ben's shoulder.

"And," spoke Ben eagerly, "he says I shall have the best teacher he can find, and all the time I want to study!"

Soon the special left to return to Hamilton, and with it went little Ben.

"Goodby! Goodby!" the cripple called from the receding parlor car, and Keanley answered with a mechanical farewell.

Then he sat in the little office and stared moodily at the fire for a long time.

"How lonesome it is without him!" he said. "I loved that little cripple, I think."

Then the sounder began to tick from Hamilton, and the message came:

"Goodby, old fellow. Little Ben."

Then Keanley sat listening to the falling rain for a long time.

Three months later he was surprised at seeing Senator Hicks and litttle Ben alight from a train at the faded station.

"Young man," said the senator abruptly, "how much of that $10,000 have you accumulated, hey?"

"A trifle over $100," Keanley answered dejectedly.

"Near enough, near enough!" jerked out the old man. "This boy has been continually talking of you, and—and—I sometimes change my mind, and—well, there is a girl at my house who seems anxious to see you."

And so it all turned out happily, just as all stories should.

There is a new agent at Lone Mound station now, and Hal Keanley is rising in the lucrative position procured for him by the old senator.

At the wedding that made Keanley Senator Hicks' son-in-law a young musical artist, who, though a cripple, is rapidly rising in popular favor, held the guests almost spellbound by the strains of a violin that seemed singing a song of happiness.—Tom P. Morgan in Romance.

Curious.

A domestic, newly engaged, presented to his master one morning a pair of boots the leg of one of which was much longer than the other. "How comes it that these boots are not the same length?" "I really don't know, sir, but what bothers me the most is that the pair down stairs are in the same fix."—Boston Woman's Journal.

THE INFLUENCE OF TRIFLES.

Jefferson was fond of telling a story which illustrates in a forcible manner the importance that absurdly insignificant matters may sometimes assume. When the deliberate body that gave the world the Declaration of Independence was in session, its proceedings were conducted in a hall close to which was situated a livery stable. The weather was warm, and from the stable came swarms of flies that lighted on the legs of the honorable members, and, biting through the thin silk stockings then in fashion, gave infinite annoyance. It was no uncommon sight, said Jefferson, to see a member making a speech with a large handkerchief in hand, and pausing at every moment to thrash the flies from his thinly protected calves. The opinion of the body was not unanimous in favor of the document, and, under other circumstances, discussion might have been portracted for days, if not weeks; but the flies were intolerable. Efforts were made to find another hall, free from the pests, but in vain. As the weather became warmer the flies grew worse, and the flapping of handkerchiefs was heard all over the hall as an accompaniment to the voices of the speakers. In despair, at last some one suggested that matters be hurried so that the body might adjourn and get away from the flies. There were a few mild protests, but no one heeded them, the immortal declaration was hurriedly copied, and, with handkerchiefs in hand fighting flies as they came, the members hastened up to the table to sign the authentic copy and leave the flies in the lurch. Had it not been for the livery stable and its inmates, there is no telling when the document would have been completed, but it certainly would not have been signed on the Fourth of July.—New York Sun.

HOW IT MAY HAPPEN.

"Jeminy crickets, she's got the rickets," whispered one beau to another in the company of a very pretty girl. Truly, she was very beautiful, but there was a twitching about the nerves of the face which showed suffering. "No," said the other, "it's neuralgia, and she's a martyr to it." St. Jacob's Oil was suggested as the world-renowned cure for it. Did she try it? Yes, and was cured by it, and married "one of the fellows" afterwards. The use of the great remedy for pain will not bring about a marriage, but in its cure of pain it will bring about conditions of health to make life more enjoyable. No man or woman ought to marry who is a sufferer from chronic pains. We should not wed woe to win only wretchedness.

TO AID EMPLOYEES.

A NEW SCHEME OF THE W. L. DOUGLAS SHOE CO.

Will Furnish Their Help With Medical Attendance.

William L. Douglas, the president of the world famed W. L. Douglas Shoe Co., has always had a great personal interest in the army of men and women who inhabit the great factory at Montello during the working hours of the day, and who make the greatly advertised $3 shoe.

Every person in his employ—and they form a small army—has recently been handed a card, a fac-simile of which is here given:

This Ticket entitles.....

to full and free medical attendance while employed by the W. L. Douglas Shoe Company. A competent and skilful physician will be at the private office of the Company at 12 m. daily, except Sundays and holidays.

If said employee should be detained at home by sickness, the physician will give full and free medical attendance there.

CONDITIONS.

The physician will not make visits outside the city limits. This ticket is not transferable, and does not apply to the family of the employee, and must be returned as soon as the term of employment ceases. This privilege is a free gift of the Company and is no part of the contract for wages, and may be made void by the Company, at its own option, without notice.

Mr. Douglas says that he believes there are hundreds of workingmen and workingwomen who find a doctor's bill a great burden after a period of enforced idleness, and that if this is lifted from them they must feel that their employer is interested in them in some other way than simply to get all the work he can for just as little money as he can.

The plan is a wise and a good one.

Speaking of the W. L. Douglas Shoe Co., it may be said that their factory is the only one in the city of Brockton where the principle of arbitration is recognized and has full sway. Mr. Douglas is a firm believer in the principle, and has been since the establishment of the State Board of Arbitration. He claims that labor troubles would not be as frequent as they are if manufacturers and help would recognize this great principle, and adopt it.

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many, who live better than others and enjoy life more, with less expenditure, by more promptly adapting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy, Syrup of Figs.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

THE BUSINESS MAN'S LUNCH.

Hard Work and Indigestion go Hand in Hand.

Concentrated thought, continued in, robs the stomach of necessary blood, and this is also true of hard physical labor.

When a five horse-power engine is made to do ten horse-power work something is going to break. Very often the hard-worked man coming from the field or the office will "bolt" his food in a few minutes which will take hours to digest. Then too, many foods are about as useful in the stomach as a keg of nails would be in a fire under a boiler. The ill-used stomach refuses to do its work without the proper stimulus which it gets from the blood and nerves. The nerves are weak and "ready to break," because they do not get the nourishment they require from the blood, finally the ill-used brain is morbidly wide awake when the overworked man attempts to find rest in bed.

The application of common sense in the treatment of the stomach and the whole system brings to the busy man the full enjoyment of life and healthy digestion when he takes Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets to relieve a bilious stomach or after a too hearty meal, and Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery to purify, enrich and vitalize the blood. The "Pellets" are tiny sugar-coated pills made of highly concentrated vegetable ingredients which relieve the stomach of all offending matters easily and thoroughly. They need only be taken for a short time to cure the biliousness, constipation and slothfulness, or torpor, of the liver; then the "Medical Discovery" should be taken in teaspoonful doses to increase the blood and enrich it. It has a peculiar effect upon the lining membranes of the stomach and bowels, toning up and strengthening them for all time. The whole system feels the effect of the pure blood coursing through the body and the nerves are vitalized and strengthened, not deadened, or put to sleep, as the so-called celery compounds and nerve mixtures do—but refreshed and fed on the food they need for health. If you suffer from indigestion, dyspepsia, nervousness, and any of the ills which come from impure blood and disordered stomach, you can cure yourself with Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery which can be obtained at any drug store in the country.

ANTHRACITE COAL.

Talk on the Wenders of the Crafts.

SKILLED HANDS AND INDUSTRY.

How Coal is Mined—Little Similarity Between the Mining of Hard and Soft Coal.

In most trades the engineer starts at the bottom and works up; but the hard-coal miner reverses this order of progress. He starts far up in the roof of the "breakers" as a slate picker; from there he descends to the mine, where he becomes a "driver," or, as it is called in the Illinois mines, "mule-whacker;" then he rises to the dignity of a laborer or miner's helper, and finally he reaches the height of his ambition and is a full-fledged miner.

All through the anthracite district in Pennsylvania are great heaps of "culm,' the refuse of the mines, with their peaks on a level with the stepped roofs of the breakers. In these great frame buildings the hard coal is broken into the different sizes and separated from the slate. Great rollers, with enormous spike-like teeth, break the coal, and boys from 12 to 16 years old straddle the chutes and throw out the pieces of slate as the broken coal passes down the incline. Black dust and deafening noises fill the breaker. The crash of coal dumped from the cars upon the screens, the roar of the rollers breaking the coal, the rumble of machinery and thunder of sliding coal scraping the iron-lined runways, reverberate through the hollow building, but above it all are heard the shrill cries of the slate-pickers. The "shut-down" whistle moans, and the boys, with coal dust an inch thick on their faces, troop out of the building, down the steps, skylarking, yelping, crying "a-a-lls-over-r," as they hurry out, each in a little cloud of coal dust.

The slate-pickers work at an elevation of from fifty to eighty feet above the railroad tracks. The car of coal is lifted from the mine to the highest point in the breaker, and is dumped upon a slanting screen, which has bars from four to five inches apart. At the bottom of the screen is an iron platform somewhat "on the slant," but not as steep as the screen, so that when the large, jagged lumps of coal strike it they move slowly. The coal comes from the mine in large lumps, some of them mixed with slate. As the lumps run down the iron platform men with picks examine them, and sometimes break off large pieces of slate. From this platform the coal falls into a hopper above a set of rolls, which have steel teeth. These teeth crush the lumps of coal, breaking them into smaller bits, which slide down a chute into a revolving screen. The screen has openings of different sizes for large egg, small egg, chestnut, stove and other grades of hard coal, which pass down iron-lined chutes to the slate-pickers.

Sometimes the boys sit with their feet in the chute, the smallest boy at the top and the largest at the bottom.

As the coal passes down the boys pick out the slate and throw it into a box or into another chute which leads to a car. The boys become so expert that they can tell slate by the feeling and this knack once acquired gives them unlimited opportunities for shying bits of coal and slate at visitors or at the superannuated miner who stands behind them with a twelve-foot rod in hand. This rod is alike an emblem of authority and a means of punishment. In order to check the descent of the coal the slate-pickers use pieces of wood to dam the flow or else block the coal with their feet. The coal finally finds its way into large hoppers, each size by itself, free from slate, clean and ready to be shipped. In some mines the coal is broken again and again, washed and cleaned before it is divided into all the various sizes of anthracite.

Illinois soft coal miners who think thy are in great luck if they have a three-foot vein to work with a fair roof and not too much water, speak of hard-coal mining as "quarrying." To them the twenty and thirty foot veins, broad working face, and use of dynamite partake more of cutting out stone in an open cut than of underground work. On the other hand, the hard coal miners refer contemptuously to the bituminous miners as "gophers" and "prairie dogs."

There is little similarity between the mining of hard coal and soft coal. In soft coal mines the greatest danger comes from falling roofs or tops; in hard coal mines the greatest danger comes from explosive gases. But taking it all around the Pennsylvania miner has the best of it. He at least can stand upright when working, he has large high "roads" or "gangways" through which he goes to and from work, and he can use explosives in getting out his coal. In some Illinois mines powder is used for blasting, but the coal which has been blasted is likely to be blown to bits too small to escape the gratings of the screen. In Illinois mines most of the coal is sent to the top, but in hard coal mines it is estimated that 40 per cent of the coal is left in the mines in the pillars which support the top.

When the vein of anthracite coal is flat a vertical shaft is sunk and "gangways" or, to use the Illinois miners' expression, "mainroads" are tunneled out on each side of the shaft to some distance. Usually no coal is mined immediately around the shaft, for the engine house, shaft top and breaker are grouped around it on the surface and the coal must be left to support the buildings and machinery. The shaft is divided into four parts; two of them used for the "cages," as the elevators which lift the coal are called, one for the ventilating shaft and the other as a means of escape in case of an accident in the bottom. The cages travel up and down at a rate of about 2,000 feet a minute, and two of them can lift 1,000 tons or more in a day. The gangways are solidly timbered, and parallel to them, at a distance of 40 to 50 feet, the air-ways are "driven" or tunneled. "Crosscuts" connect the air-ways with the gangways at frequent intervals, and from the gangways connect the main roads with the "room" or "chamber" in which the miner is at work.

That part of the vein of coal in the rooms which is being mined is called the "face" or "breast." If the vein is flat and level or has but little slant to it the mine cars hauled by mules are brought directly to the breast and after being loaded are hauled to the bottom of the shaft. This cannot be done, however, if the vein dips or inclines to a considerable degree. Where sharp dips prevail a vertical shaft is sunk until it is below that part of the vein which is to be worked and then gangways are run off horizontally to the slanting vein of coal. From the gangway the miner drives an entry into the coal, following it up the slape for a distance before he begins to work the face of the coal. This entry, which is a narrow, low tunnel, is called "chute" and connects the gangway, which is below the breast, with the room in which the miner is at work. It follows then that any coal which the miner gets out will slide down this chute into the gangway, and so into the mine cars which are placed under the chute. When the "dip" is not too steep, the coal is sent down the chute as fast as it is mined, but when the dip is steeper, a door at the bottom of the shute holds back the coal, and the mined coal gradually accumulates until the chute is choked and the room is nearly full. This suits the miner, for if the vein is thick the mined coal provides a footing for him so that he can work the full width of the vein. When the chute is full the miner drives what are called "manways" on either side of the chute for air and entrance to the breast, and he sends down the surplus coal through these manways.

The vertical shaft is sunk down deeper and deeper as the vein is worked out and each horizontal gangway is called a level. The miner drills holes in the coal, puts in dynamite cartridges, and after the shot, sets his laborer to work filling cars. In the bottom of each car is a hook. Before the coal is put in the miner hangs his check on the hook. This is a metal check bearing his number. When the coal is dumped in the breaker the weigh boss takes the check from the hook and credits that number with the coal in the car.

Some of the veins are sixty feet thick and the rooms are great caverns with polished black walls which are lost in the dense gloom of the place. But in these caves and pockets fire-damp and other inflammable explosive gases accumulate and must be dissipated by thorough ventilation. The fan over the air-shaft is an exhaust fan. It sucks the impure air out of the mine, the pure air finding the levels through the shaft. It is necessary that the air take a definite course through the mine in order to reach all the rooms, and as the various gangways, crosscuts entries, worked-out breasts and other underground work make up a veritable labyrinth, the current of air is held in bounds by stopping certain openings and crosscuts. This is done with doors when the gangways and crosscuts are in use, and boys are hired to open and close the doors. In Illinois mines such boys are known as trappers," but in Pennsylvania they are called "door-tenders."

Another method of working the mines in which the vein dips is to follow the slope from the outcrop. In such mines the shaft is on an incline, and the bottom of the mine can be reached by walking. Some mines are wet" and require constant pumping and as high as 2,000,000 gallons of water a day have been lifted from them.

Hard coal mining gives employment when the pool wills it to over 100,000 men and boys, and over 40,000,000 tons of coal are shipped out of the anthracite district annually. Geologists have endeavored to arrive at some definite estimate of the quantity of hard coal left in Pennsylvania, but they vary in their guesses from 10,000,000,000 tons of to 25,000,000,000. The hard coal area covers about 475 square miles, and it is a curious fact that no soft coal is found in the anthracite region, nor is there any hard coal found in the bituminous areas. The hard coal veins vary from three feet to sixty feet in thickness, and the lowest is about 3,000 feet below the surface.—Mail and Express.

Jumping Seeds and Other Galls.

The galls of Andricus saliens are known in California as "flea seeds," from their jumping about on the ground. This results from the spasmodic movements of the larva inside the thin wall cavity of the gall. Another California gall has been described as covered with mobile hairs, which are sensitive to touch, like the leaves of the mimosa. Very remarkable, too, is the relationship subsisting between the cynipidæ and figs.

Certain species of sawfly deposit their eggs in the seed vessels of the florets in the interior of the wild fig. When fully developed, the sawflies emerge, covered with pollen obtained from the male flowers near the opening of the fig. Following an ancient custom, the Greeks and Italians hang up bunches of the wild fruit on their cultivated fig trees, and the pollen covered flies which escape from them enter the cultivated figs and fertilize the female florets in their interiors. This operation is known as caprification.

The figs of the wild variety might almost be described as galls, since they serve as hatcheries for the sawflies. Each specie of fig would appear to have its own special sawfly. The Dead sea fruit, or apples of Sodom, "which tempt the eye, but turn to ashes on the lip," are probably galls on a species of oak produced by Cynips insana, though some suppose that the reference is to the fruit of a species of asclepias.—

When a Man Comes to Forty Years.

THE AMBITIONS MERE MOONSHINE.

False Lights Betray Him Into Wrong Directions, False Standards Make Him Wrong Measurements.

When the War of the Rebellion began my father had just passed his fortieth year. He entered the army, and before going to the front passed much of his time on horseback while the troops were being organized. I was a very little chap, but I remember thinking that it was most hazardous for so elderly a man to be galloping about on a great big horse. The largeness of the horse, together with my father's advanced age, seemed to my youthful mind to make a combination much more dangerous than the perils of battle. I recalled this youthful feeling very forcibly the other day when I was made to realize that young men and young women looked upon me in very much the same way that I had regarded my father some thirty years ago. I was talking with a lady about her daughter, a most charming girl of nineteen. The mother spoke regretfully of the fact that the daughter had little of the frivolity, which usually passes in young girls for gayety, and for that reason was not attractive to young men. I remarked that the young lady was too charming, too intellectual, too original and altogether too good to be properly appreciated by an immature stripling. "Indeed, madam," I continued, "your daughter can only be appreciated by a real man, a full-grown man," and then I quoted from Thackeray—

"Forty times over let Michaelmas pass,
Grizzling hair the brain doth clear—
Then you know a boy is an ass,
Then you know the worth of a lass,
Once you have come to Forty Year."

Madame le Mere did not ponder at all upon what I said, but answered at once and impatiently:

"Oh, I don't want my girl to marry an old man."

Now this lady who spoke of a man of forty as old is a woman of experience and herself on the upper side of forty. So she thinks me an old man, I said to myself with considerable inward amusement.

A few days later I was walking along a country lane with the charming daughter just alluded to. When my hat blew off she ran after it as she would have chased that of her grandfather. This was not so bad, for I was just recovering from an illness and was accustomed to the privileges of invalidism. But when I thanked her with my most gallant air she remarked that manners of the old school were very pretty in this brusk, busy and bustling world. So she, too, thought me an old fellow and would have regarded the love-making of any of my contemporaries with something of amused horror. It is not fair to generalize from two instances and to say that my experiences with this mother and daughter proved that men of forty were looked upon as well past their youth and far along into middle life, if not actually beyond the boundary and already old. But I have not been permitted to rest with these two instances alone; evidences that young people look upon men of my age as quite elderly come now in battalions every week. And the other day I read some gossip in my favorite newspaper and my intimate contemporaries were spoken of as elderly men. To be sure, the reporter who wrote the piece alluded to, was in all probability quite fresh from college. But it was evidence to the point, notwithstanding. After reviewing all that I have observed, all that I have heard and all that I have read I must conclude that to men and women under thirty men of forty appear quite middle aged, and that to boys and girls under twenty when a man has come to forty years he is looked upon as quite venerable. Mature men do not coincide with these views, but I am inclined to believe from what little evidence I have on the subject that very many mature women do hold to the opinion that men of forty are too old for the sentimental purposes of other than quite elderly spinsters and well-seasoned and case-hardened widows.

And when I look at the question myself seriously, after having recovered from the first shock of realizing that my youth has irrevocably gone, I cannot but see that the young people in the main are entirely right. A man of eighty is very old indeed—as a rule a man who has passed the Scriptural limit of three score years and ten takes a pride in the fact that he has survived the generality of his contemporaries, and consequently there is as well defined a pride in old age as there is arrogance in youth. A man of forty, therefore, looking at the matter in this way, is surely well into middle life, and so, too, is a man of thirty-five. But it is a hard thing to have to realize this thing all at once and to accept the fact that in most of the contests you are finally and forever out of the running.

And yet a man of forty has just come to his own. It is rare at an earlier age than this that a man's tastes and appreciations are so nicely adjusted that he can see the things of the world in their right relation to one another. Before that false lights betray him into wrong directions, false standards make for him wrong measurements. Now if he have some little capacity for wisdom, he looks upon what we are in the habit of calling success at its true value and knows that the true course of happiness is found in being neither very rich nor very poor, in being neither a great functionary nor a servile menial. The middle course, he sees, is the best course, and if he will think of it he will find that the middle life, with its sure pleasures and quiet enjoyments, is the best life after all. But middle life in a few years changes into old age, and therefore, now that the shock of realizing that a man of forty will soon be an old man, I am free to admit that the mother I alluded to a little while ago was wiser than I in her determination that her girl should not marry an old man.

Ask men of forty if they feel differently from when they were thirty, and they will, to a man, if they be in good health, say that they do not. They say this thoughtlessly, however. As a matter of fact, they feel very differently. They lack elasticity of spirit; their muscles are less pliable. And so the jokes of ten years before seem horse play, the ambitions mere moonshine. The athletic exercises of the former period are too rough, and the sprinter must now content himself with the more sedate walk. The grizzled hair and the clear brain of the man of forty are pretty sure guarantees that he will not go to much touble merely for the sake of having a good time. A young fellow does this because he has not learned that good times are never found when sought for and that when they do come they are always incidental and unintentional. It is not my purpose to sing the praises of middle life, for I know full well that whatever I might say would not convince a single person in the world to that degree that he would not be mighty glad to have his youth again. What if a boy does make a fool of himself?—and I would not give a rap for a boy who was not a good deal of a fool—he is merely peparing himself for the saner pleasures of late life. I have no more contempt for the silly vanities of early youth than I have for the measles and the chicken-pox. They are alike inevitable, and the youth who has passed through the illnesses and sillinesses of childhood is the better and safe for the experiences. When the ordinary illnesses of childhood attack a mature man he usually has a pretty hard time; and so, too, with the sillinesses of youth when men take them up. They are then most dreadful things, for there is a deal of truth in the adage that there is no fool like an old fool. When a man in middle life, after a period of hard and successful work, grows a crop of vanities and becomes a coxcomb, he is beyond endurance and cannot be reclaimed. The silliness that we laugh at in a boy is hateful in a man, and therefrore it is not an unlucky thing for the boy to exhaust all that is in his nature, so that there will be none left to make the man contemptible. Froude maintains that just at the period when a man realizes that he has lost his youth he is the easiest possible victim of a designing woman who seems to be charmed by him, because it is so wonderfully pleasant to him to be persuaded that he has not lost his power to please. For this reason, the historian says, Cleopatra found Mark Antony's subjugation the opposite of difficult. Granting this theory to be true, we cannot therefore conclude that a man, even when he has come to forty years, is safe from making a fool of himself unless he has in his youth used up his capacity in that dircetion and knows by experience whither the byroads from the straight and narrow path will lead him. This is no argument in favor of wild dissipations in youth. Heaven forbid that I should counsel any such things. I do not speak of dissipations at all, but merely of the little foolishnesses and vanities which are natural to healthy youth—things only to be laughed at, not to be grieved over. But these things are different in men—in full-grown men. Then such things create laughter also, but it is only the sardonic laughter of contempt.

If, therefore, the man of forty be not entirely safe from follies and temptations, and if he have only these things which will come to the younger people if they but wait awhile, and if he has lost very much of that which young people most prize, I don't see what in the world he has to make him proud. Indeed, he is not proud. In losing his youth he has lost his capacity for pride—unless he be seduced away from a middle-aged man's normal condition. There is only left to him, therefore, his capacity to work hard, to enjoy quietly, to appreciate correctly, to judge wisely, and to be a real full-grown man in a manly way, which after all is about the best attainment possible in this good, beautiful and very pleasant world.—Gilmer Speed, in Once a Week.

CARNEGIE EXPLAINS.

Andrew Carnegie thus explains his remark that "men who die rich die disgraced:" "I had no reference to men who died leaving competencies, for I believe such men are the salt of civilization, but to men leaving millions in securities which they could have used in their lifetime. I said I believed the day would come when such men would die disgraced, and that the tribute of approval would be given to those upon whose tombstones could be truthfully written: 'He lived without ostentation, and he died poor,' as was said of Pitt.'

ONE OF LINCOLN'S STORIES.

President Lincoln, who loved to hear stories of the slodiers and their humorous pranks, told me of a soldier who was being carried to the rear in a great engagement seriously wounded, and likely to die. He espied a sutler woman with leatherly-looking pies, driving her trade on "the devious verge of battle fought.' The bleeding soldier grinned at the woman and said: "Say, old lady, are those pies sewed or pegged?"—Noah Brooks, in the November Century.

THE HEART OF CHINA.

Millions of People in Helpless Poverty.

HOW THE DEAD ARE DISPOSED OF.

Plains That are Immense Cemeteries. Tomb of a Canonized American. Corrupt Government Officials.

Bishop Galloway of the Methodist Church South writes to the "Christian Advocate" from Shanghai, concerning a recent trip in the interior of China. The tour was made chiefly in boats on the canals, in sedan chairs, and on an odd, one-wheeled vehicle that the writer calls a wheel-barrow. Nantziang, Kading, Sung-Kiang and other cities were visited.

Traveling by canal is the popular mode of getting about. It is wretchedly slow. To go to Kading from Nantziang and back—eight miles each way—took nearly all day. These canals intersect at every angle and almost every mile and are crowded with curious craft. Boats are "foreign" and "native" and of every size, from the junk of several tons to the little "foot boat," in which a single passenger must sit circumspectly or get a dipping. In narrow places passing boats are sometimes so jammed as to obstruct travel for hours. Such an experience our boat had, but fortunately we were not on board. Our little vessel has a nice cabin, in which we eat and sleep, being furnished with a table, chairs and two beds. It is rowed by five coolies, who either pull on the oars or a line from the bank, unless we have favoring winds and can use the sail. Horses are evidently too much of a luxury in China to be used for motive power on the canals. The canal-boat population is large and distinct. Thousands of people have no other home. Children, chickens and dogs are raised there and never live on land.

The trip from Rading to Wongdoo, eight miles, was made by the Bishop on a wheel, not the sort familiar to our bicycle enthusiasts, but more on the wheel-barrow order of vehicles. The wheel is in the centre and covered with wooden slats. Passengers sit on the side of the wheel. If there are two they balance each other; if only one, the coolie skillfully tilts the vehicle to one side until a balance is reached and then trots off. A rope on either side forms a stirrup in which the foot can rest.

It was during this odd ride that the traveler's eyes met a strange and shocking sight. During that ride and walk of eight miles—for we had to walk over numerous bridges and bad places—we must have seen four or five hundred unburried coffins. Most of them were covered with straw and left in the open field. Thus, thousands of China's dead are sleeping above ground, and in wooden coffins falling to pieces by the action of sun and storm. Mounds beneath which others are buried can be counted by thousands.

The whole country is an immense cemetery, the land being cultivated in patches between graves and coffins. And these coffins are a curiosity. They are made of wood from six to nine inches thick, and are hermetically sealed. I saw one that could not have weighed less than 500 pounds.

Sun Kiang is a walled city of great commercial and political importance. Including the suburban towns, it probably has nearly 200,000 inhabitants. Chinese populations must be estimated, there are no statistical returns. Uninjured by the Tai-Ping rebellion, it has maintained its commercial supremacy, and, being a military station has considerable political distinction. From the top of the 5-storied pagoda was obtained a magnificent view of the country which stretches far away for weary leagues, as level as a plain, culivated like a garden. A tall pagoda here and there stands out against the sky, and in one direction a few hills, called mountains, on the tops of which heathen temples are built, except one occupied by the Roman Catholics. Many towns and cities are to be seen with their crowded populations, making one constantly wonder where they find daily bread—or rather rice. The ordinary and polite salutation among the Chinese is: "Have you had rice today?" And they are miserably poor. Thousands live on a few cents a day, and if unable to work, are compelled to suffer. Even skilled laborers, carpenters, blacksmiths, etc. receive from 20 to 25 cents a day, while common workmen get from 10 to 20 cents, and count themselves very fortunate.

In Sung-Kiang is the tomb of Ward, the American filibuster, who figured in Walker's Nicaraguan expedition and afterward came to China. He offered his services to the Government in the Tai-Ping rebellion, raised an army, and led it victoriously in every contest. To him probably is due the credit of organizing the so-called "all-victorious" army which General Gordon afterward commanded, and with which he made quick work of the rebellion. Ward held Sung-Kiang against the rebels and the adjacent country, but at the close of a battle was struck by a spent ball and killed. By order of the Government a memorial temple was built in his honor, behind which he sleeps in an unmarked mound. He was canonized according to heathen rites, and the people commanded to worship his spirit. We visited the temple, and found an old soothsayer in charge, plying his trade and making merchandise out of the superstitious and afflicted.

In another temple was a large picture of some horrible, dragon-like animal, desperately trying to devour the sun. This picture, by Government order, is in the houses of all Chinese officials as a warning against avarice. But, from universal report, the lesson is lost and the warning unheeded. Officials are said to be monsters of iniquity—grasping without exception and corrupt without limitation. Every contract is a job, and almost every act a judicial crime. On this account there is universal and utter lack of confidence in all Government officers. No man can hold office in his native province, and the term of service is limited to three years. But in this time fortunes are stolen and a poor mandarin becomes a sort of fabulous Croesus. This occasions the widespread discontent in China and threatens her overthrow far more than the navy and army of Japan. At any moment rebellions may break out which will make the canals of China run red with the blood of her sons.

Another evidence of the utter lack of confidence in each other's integrity is the system of exacting security money. If you rent a house for $50 a year, you must pay down $50 in advance as security. Then if you pay the monthly rental as it falls due, the advance payment will be returned at the end of the year or when you give up the house. They have no laws to enforce the payment of debts.

The masses have no religion. They care little for their temples, and have no worship worth the name. Theirs is a vague superstition, without any definite faith. What the literary and high-class people may believe is another matter. But this is certainly true of the ignorant millions.

Chinese houses have no fireplaces. They are not heated in winter, however deep the snow. A Chinaman keeps warm by adding another jacket or two. In this way the temperature is estimated. It is not so many degrees cold, but so many coats.

EXPERIMENTING WITH FOWLS.

The experiment station at Calhoun, Ala., has been making some test of egg-producers and general purpose fowls. Here are the results:

The Plymouth Rock have led, followed closely by brown Leghorn, Hamburg, Houdan-Minorca, and Langshan. Previous to this year the Leghorns have made the best record for egg-production for three successive years. The Plymouth Rocks, however, had the advantage of the run of the place.

It it impossible to maintain the purity of the breeds without close confinement, and yet such confinement is very prejudicial to health and egg-production. The European breeds are all great spring and summer layers, are small and non-setters. It is pretty well established that the Leghorns are the best egg-producers of all breeds.

The Asiatics are generally good winter and early spring layers, and make excellent mothers, and are good table fowls.

The Langshans stand at the head of the list, and are regarded as one of the best general-purpose fowls.

The Plymouth Rocks are also good winter and spring layers and make excellent mothers; they are hardy, of quick growth and good table fowls.

Of the breeds mentioned the Langshan and Plymouth Rocks are considered the best general-purpose fowls; the Leghonrs or Hamburgs the best egg-proudcers. Such are the conclussions reached after several years' experience, the hens being confined during the time in small pens and fed only on vegetable products raised on the farm. Were a wide range possible for them the results might be different.

A CURIOSITY OF LUNACY.

There is a special form of mental disease first described in France, whose definite character is given to it by its periodicity, and hence it is called folie circulaire. In it there are three sections of the mental circle that the patient moves in, viz., elevation, depression and sanity, and in this round he spends his life, passing out of one into the other, for it is, when fully established, a very incurable disease.

The patient takes an attack of mania, during which he is joyous, restless, troublesome, extravagant, and often vicious. He eats voraciously, sleeps little, and never seems to tire. His temperature is a degree or so above the normal, his eye is bright and glistening, he shows diminished self-control and no common sense.

This lasts for a few weeks, or a few months more commonly, and then he passes sometimes gradually and some times rather suddenly, into a condition of depression, during which he is sluggish, dull, looking differently, dressing differently, eating differently, fearful, unreliant and sedentary habits.

This state will last a few weeks or months, and the patient will brighten up into what seems recovery, and is to all intents and purposes in his normal state. This again, lasts for a few weeks or months, and he gradually gets morbidly elevated. You find he is passing through every minute mental phase and habit he did at first; depression follows as before, and then sanity; and this round of three states of feeling, of intellect, of volition, and of nutrition, goes on, circle after circle, till the patient dies. He lives three lives.—Hospital.

COFFEE RAISING.

Always Full of Interest to the Reader.

PLANTING IT IN SOUTH AMERICA

First Reared in Nurseries—Trees, if Carefully Cared for, will Bear for Forty Years.

The subject of coffee raising is one that is always full of interest to the reader, and it would seem that the more that is known concerning the little berry, the more we desire to learn about its cultivation and growth. Here are a few facts in regard to the production of coffee in Spanish America which will, no doubt, be read with much interest:

The story of coffee is interesting. A native of Abyssynia, it was brought to Yensen, in Arabia Felix, in the fifteenth century. It was two centuries before coffee drinking began in Europe, and still another hundred years elapsed before the Dutch East India Company began to bring the valuable berry from Java, where the coffee tree as first planted during the last year of the seventh century.

In the beginning of the eighteenth century one solitary coffee plant took root in the soil of Martinique, whence sprung the great industry of South and Central America and of the West Indies. It was a Jesuit priest who conferred this great benefaction on the southern half of the American continent. The vessel in which the priest embarked with a half-dozen coffee plants was storm-tossed and driven out of her course, and the supply of water ran short, but the heroic man shared the small quantity distributed once a day to each soul with his precious charge, and thus saved one of the six tender little shoots.

Coffee planting in South America, on an extensive scale, is a comparatively modern industry. The first cargo of coffee shipped to the United States from Brazil, in 1809, was only 30,000 pounds. In 1888 about 212,000 tons of coffee were shipped to the United States, while the total crop was nearly 500,000 tons, worth $120,000,000.

The coffee plants are first reared in nurseries, whence they are transplanted to the regular orchard. A little ball of mold is left about the roots in transplanting. The custom in Brazil is to clear away the virgin forest and dig holes and fill with rich mold and insert the young plants. They are set in rows about 7 feet apart, and begin to bear the second or third year. If not attacked by the coffee tree worm, the trees, if carefully cared for, will bear for thirty years. They must be pruned, and are not suffered to exceed 12 feet in height. The spreading bushes, several items from one root usually, with their rich dark green foilage, are beautiful at all seasons, and a coffee plantation, with trees in bloom, and when the trees are loaded with berries, is a beautiful sight.

There are three flowering seasons, August, October and December. The yield of coffee depends on the results of the flowering and the state of the weather determines the fruiting from the blossoms. It must be neither too wet nor too dry. When the first flowering season occurs the coffee planter is on the anxious seat, and so is the coffee trader. Their anxiety usually continues generally until the third flowering season is over. If the first flowering results in a good fruiting the planter is comparatively happy, though he is always more or less anxious till his crop is saved. He prays for plenty of hot sunshine and a proper amount of moisture, both being essential to the perfect development and ripening of the berries. The coffee dealers, the trade in general, including brokers, shippers, and exporters and importers, in South America, the United States and in Euuorpe, are always greatly concerned until the results of the flowering are known. They begin to make their estimate as to the crop as soon as the first flowering season is over. They are often mistaken—indeed, usually are—but, from the general concensus of reports received, the price of the old crop of coffee on hand is largely determined. One thing is certain—there will be a demand for all the coffee grown. It is the one crop for which the demand is steadily increasing and slightly in excess of the increased production. There has been an enormous development of the coffee production of Brazil within the last few years by the extension of plantations, but the world's consumption has more than kept pace with the increased product, not only of Brazil, but of Venezeula, Central America and Mexico.—Export.

William Dean, the Indian who murdered William Baremare at Happy Camp last week, was taken to Fort Jones, Siskiyou county, on his way to Yreka, where he was to await trial. About 2 o'clock in the morning a dozen masked men broke open the door of the room where the prisoner was kept, carried him about 200 yards down the main street and hanged him to a derrick that had been used in the construction of a new building. The mob quietly dispersed, leaving no clew to the identity of any one.

The Senate bill pledging the faith of the United States to do construction work on the Nicaragua Canal has passed the Senate by a decisive vote of 31 to 20. The bill in brief directs the issuance of seventy million dollars' worth of Nicaragua Canal bonds, each of which is to bear the fellowing guarantee "The United States of America guarantee to the lawful holder of this bond payment by the Martime Canal Company of Nicaragua of the principle of said bonds and the interest accruing thereon, and as it accrues an additional thirty million of bonds is to be issued without the United States guarantee. The total of one hundred millions thus is to be used in constructing an inter-oceanic canal. The Secretary of Treasury is to have the general supervision of the project. A board of fifteen directors is to have the immediate charge of the work. The Board is to designate ten members, no more than two from any one State. The United States is to receive seventy million of the canal company stock in return for guaranteeing the bonds and it is to hold a mortgage lien on all the property of the canal company."

The fact may as well be accepted that legal hanging for murder in this country is practically played out. There were only 132 deaths of this sort during the last year, whereas the number of homicide was 9,800. This goes to show not only a decided laxity in criminal jurisprudence, but also a well defined public feeling against the death penalty. If a conviction on the charge of murder meant life imprisonment instead of the gallows there would be far fewer verdicts of acquittal, and the law would be vindicated where it is now merely made a farce and a mockery. The average jury hesitates to pronounce a man guilty when it signifies the taking of a human life, and the only alternative is to declare him innocent in spite of the evidence to the contrary.

Governor Budd unquestionably has as much authority to remove Police Commissioners Alvord and Tobin as he had to remove Dan Burn's man Gunst, and in promptly exercising the authority that his official adviser informed him he could exercise he has earned the gratitude and admiration of all the decent and intelligent people of the State. Anyone who thinks that Governor Budd lacks the courage to do his duty, or is lacking in intelligence or conscience to determine what is his duty, does not know the man as well as those did who persuaded him to run for Governor.

The present legislature may want to be economical, but it is doubtful whether the people will permit the extravagance to which we have been accustomed to be discontinued. The army of attaches for the senate and assembly is as great as ever, and the appropriation bills introduced show that the usual raids are to be made on the treasury. The counties where asylums, reform schools, etc. are located are clamoring for increased appropriations and Governor Budd will have to be relied upon to keep down state expenses.

Senator McGowan has introduced a bill making it unlawful in this State for any person by will to give to any person or corporation more than $500,000 worth of property. It is entitled "An act to prevent the undue concentration of wealth in the hands of persons who have not earned it." It would seem as though half a million were enough for anyone to begin the world with.

Now that it's all over it does look rather odd that San Francisco should hold indignation meetings over the appointment of Mose Gunst as policee commissioner when they had worried along under the administration of Dan Burns for years without a murmur. Gunst was "a man of business integrity in legitimate branches," but not even that much could be said of Burns.

Governor Budd has appointed a woman on the board of trustees of the State Normal school at San Jose. Thus does the Democratic executive begin the redemption of his ante-election pledges.

DAIRY & CREAMERY.

A FAMOUS FRENCH SOFT CHEESE.

Made In Gerardmer and Called Gerome Cheese For Short.

This cheese, one of the soft varieties, is made in that rich pastoral region of eastern France known as the Vosges. This is a mountain country, interspersed with valleys well watered by clear streams, which are used to irrigate the level meadows or the gentle slopes that are covered with the sweetest verdure, on which the choicest of the French dairy cows luxuriate and produce the richest kind of milk. It is doubtless to this excellent pasture as well as to the extreme care in the manipulation of the milk and the curing of the cheese that this special variety is one of the most popular in every European country, thus affording a market not only at home, but elsewhere, for more than 15,000,000 pounds annually.

FIG. 1—DOUBLE MOLD FOR CURD. [A B, divisions.]

The name Gerome is the short for the full name of the district, Gerardmer.

Two kinds of cheese are made here, the soft and the hard, the former of which is mostly used at home, the latter being largely exported and to some considerable extent to the United States, where it sells for about twice the price of the finest native cheese. The soft cheese, which is here to be described, is made plain or flavored by the anise plant or the seed.

The method of manufacture is most careful and skillful. Every care is taken with the milk to insure perfect curing without the interference of any impurity, even of the air of the dairies or curing cellars. The food of the cows is the purest afforded by a generous nature, for it is washed by the frequent rains falling from the clouds far above the contamination of the lower earth and nourished by the pure air free from the impurities common at lower levels. Evil germs are rare in such elevated places. Yet the milk is carefully strained through three fine linen cloths, and in addition a mat of the common club moss is used as an extra obstruction to the passage of the least particle of dust that might fall into the milk during the process of the time occupied in its transit from the cow to the cheese vat. This club moss, Lycopodium clavatum, is common in the European mountains, and also in Canada and the northern United States. It is a low growing creeping mossy plant that roots as it crawls along the ground and sends up short branches on its course. It is thought that it has some quality that affects the curdling of the milk, which may be so, for it is not the only plant that exerts this effect on milk or that is used in this way in making cheese.

The curd is made of carefully prepared rennet, made from the stomach of a calf, well washed and dried, and steeped in water three or four days, adding a little saffron to give the desired yellowish tinge to the curd. Two tablespoonfuls of the rennet are used for 50 quarts of milk. The curd is made in half an hour and is then divided to let the whey separate, and this is removed with care to avoid breaking the curd lest the cream might be partly lost.

The curd is then dipped into a mold in two parts (Fig. 1). This is filled with the curd, which gradually settles down into the lower half as the whey escapes from the bottom. In 12 hours the curd is down to the dividing line (A or B), when it is placed in another mold, in which it is turned along with the mold, which is reversed each time, at intervals of six hours during two days. The cheeses are placed on tables, but raised an inch or so on bars to aid in the drainage of the whey. The tables are slightly inclined to facilitate the escape of the liquid. In the large dairies these tables are in tiers of three, the whey dripping off at one end in a gutter and falling into tubs placed to collect it. The temperature of the place in which this operation is carried on is carefully kept at 58 degrees.

When the whey no longer drains off, the cheeses are salted. The salt is spread on a table, and the cheeses are rolled in it, so that each part is covered, and this operation is performed daily three or four times. During this time the cheeses are turned every day, and for a few days afterward twice a day, during which time they sweat and are wiped with a cloth dipped in warm water. The quantity of salt is one ounce for about five pounds of cheese, this being the average smallest weight of this cheese.

FIG. II—GEROME CHEESE.

At this stage of the cheese care is taken to avoid any damage by the softness of the cheese, and if this is apprehended the use of the mold is continued for a few days until the crust has become firm enough, but the cheese is still changed end for end until it is dry enough for the next stage.

This is the removal to the drying house. This is an airy room furnished with shelves one over the other, on which the cheeses are arranged. The cheeses are protected from the direct rays of the sun and also from flies by curtains of linen. When the weather is too warm in the summer, these curtains are wet so that the evaporation may cool the air as much as possible. In winter the drying room is kept closed.

As soon as the cheeses are dry they are moved to the curing cellar. Here they are subjected to the most careful scrutiny. The temperature is carefully regulated by windows and drafts of air admitted through them, shutters being used to change the current as desired. The curing process occupies three or four months, as the weights of the cheeses make necessary, for the full ripening. During this process the cheeses are often washed with warm water slightly salted. This is to prevent too rapid drying and curing. The effect of the curing is to produce certain changes in the curd which cannot be hastened, or the result would be unfavorable. The appearance of a brick red color on the surface of the cheese and such a buttery softness that the surface easily yields to the pressure of the finger indicate the completion of the curing. The cheeses are then ready for sale.

Four quarts of whole milk make a pound of finished cheese. Some cheese of this name is made of milk, one-third of which is skimmed. The anised cheese is of the best quality, and the leaves used give that peculiar greenish tinge which is a special characteristic, as it is also of the exquisite Roquefort, for which the Gerome is often substituted. The weights vary from 5 to 12 pounds. The anise is used by mixing it in layers in the curd as it is placed in the mold. The green leaves of the plant are used dried and powdered. With good care and by wrapping in tin foil this cheese, like the Roquefort, may be kept a whole year.—Montreal Herald.

To Make Butter Come.

I well remember when a boy and the cows were all strippers, fed on dry fodder (hay, straw and cornstalks), with little or no grain, watered but once a day and then drinking through a hole in the ice from a pond and probably not taking all the water they needed, being rarely salted, and using no thermometer to tell the temperature of the cream at churning, how I used to dread churning day with the prospect of a long, sweaty siege, with no idea of how long it would last and a possibility of ending up with the exclamation, "This butter will never come!" For 20 years past we have had no such trouble. The conditions were changed.

I would suggest the following: Give the cows some succulent food in winter, such as silage or roots. Feed with their grain ration one or two pounds of oil-meal daily. Let them have free access to salt. Give them all the water they will drink at a temperature considerably above ice water. If possible have some fresh milkers in the herd and not have all strippers at any one time. Have the cream rich—that is, with as little milk in it as possible. If a separator is used, this can easily be done. If the cream is obtained by deep, cold setting, put it in a deep cream can, with a faucet at the bottom, so that after it has set for a day or more milk that has gone to the bottom can be drawn off. Ripen the cream well. Have a correct thermometer and use it. If you have by the means mentioned got the cream too rich and thick to churn good, dilute it with water. This will reduce its viscosity, which is frequently the cause of difficult churning.

Strippers' milk in the winter time, with cows fed on dry feed, has to be churned at a higher temperature than that of fresh milkers in summer. I have known it to be necessary to churn at 68 to 70 degrees. But you must find out the temperature necessary for you to churn by trying. Nobody can tell you. So much depends on the cows, the feed and other conditions.—C. P. Goodrich in Breeder's Gazette.

A New Thing In Books.

It has been suggested that the contrast between the black and white of a printed page would be less trying to the eye if the latter could simultaneously rest on a bit of color. Accordingly a Boston publisher is getting out books that have margins of azure, yellow or green.—Boston Letter.

Henry Ishine left on yesterday's train for Bridgeport. He will probably be absent about a week.

Robert Love was down from Bishop early in the week as a witness in the case of McGee vs Givens.

Miss Etta Naylor is acting station agent at Alvord during the absence of Mrs. Hale at San Francisco.

The deepest mine in the United States is at Grass Valley, Nevada county, It is over 1800 feet vertically.

S. G. Sneden Esq. came down from Bishop last Friday and remained in town until yesterday morning.

The annual Fiesta or Carnival at Los Angeles, Cal., will take place this year from the 15th to the 20th of April.

The Independence Church Choir has reorganized and beautiful singing services are rendered every Sunday evening.

Owing to the large drifts of snow in the White Mountains, the railroad company sent a snow-plow to the summit last Monday.

Mrs. J. C. Irwin arrived home last Monday evening after an extended tour through the eastern states. She visited New York and other large cities and spent considerable time with her sister, Mrs. Loomis at El Paso, Texas. Her daughter, Miss Nettie, remained with Mrs. Loomis.

Mining Items.

There is quite a mining excitement reported at Mountain Spring on the east side of Salt Wells Valley on the old Darwin stage road about twenty miles from Indian Wells. There are about fifty men in the new camp and more are going there. W. K. Miller will put on a stage line commencing next Wednesday and will make daily trips from Indian Wells to the camp. There has also been a revival of the old mines about fifteen miles west of the stage station at Red Rock. These mines were worked many years ago and abandoned The old tunnels have been cleared out and good strikes of ore are reported. Mr Miller will also run a stage to this point. Frank Fitzgerald and Billy Smith have struck a good mine about two miles west of Modock which will yield a large quantity of good ore carrying both gold and silver. The Sorba mine at Darwin, owned by D. C. Lane, is being extensively developed and put in a condition to be worked on a large scale. It is said that J. J. Morton has an excellent property at Snows Canyon, a rich strike having been recently made. Pat Clinton has struck a good body of ore at Cerro Gordo and will soon be making shipments. There is a great deal of activity in mining interests all over southern Inyo and 1895 will undoubtedly be a prosperous year.

The Fair Appropriation

A strong effort will be made at Sacramento to defeat any appropriations for District Fairs. The proposition being to hold two State Fairs, one at Sacramento and one at Los Angeles, these being the only institutions of the kind to receive State aid. It is needless to argue the benefit derived by us from the annual appropriation; that is fully understood. The proposition is, how to secure its continuance. As in all other country districts, we must depend upon our representative in the Assembly, where the apropriation will originate. He must make common cause with others similarly situated, and push the matter in a determined manner. If anything is to be done the effort is to be made at once.

A Surprise.

At the invitation of Mrs. J. D. Blair a large number of friends met at her residence last Friday evening "to surprise Doc." They did. The occasion was his 79th birthday, and more than a third of the years making up that total were spent at Independence. He was sent into the parlor to light the lamp and when the glow reflected upon the smiling faces of friends and neighbors the old gentleman was keenly touched with emotion at the exhibition of friendly regard. The evening was agreeably spent in games, music and singing. The hostess was gratified by the ample justice done the lunch of cakes, coffee and other delicacies that were served. Many happy returns, Doc.

Health Officers Speak.

City, State and National Authorities report the Royal Baking Powder in every way Superior to all others.

STATE CHEMIST, CALIFORNIA: The ROYAL fulfils all the requirements. Our tests show it has greater leavening power than any other.

STATE CHEMIST, WASHINGTON: There is no question but the ROYAL is the strongest, purest and most wholesome baking powder in the market.

U. S. GOV'T FOOD REPORT: ROYAL BAKING POWDER is shown a pure cream of tartar powder, highest of all in leavening strength.

CANADIAN OFFICIAL TESTS: ROYAL BAKING POWDER is commended as of highest excellence, and shown to be greatest of all in leavening strength.

SAN FRANCISCO BOARD OF HEALTH: We cordially approve and recommend the ROYAL BAKING POWDER. It is absolutely pure and healthful, composed of the best ingredients, of the highest strength and character.

BOARD OF HEALTH, SEATTLE, WASHINGTON: Finding in analysis that it is entirely free from any adulteration, we heartily recommend the ROYAL BAKING POWDER for its great strength, purity and wholesomeness.

BOARD OF HEALTH, TACOMA, WASHINGTON: In our judgment the ROYAL is the best and strongest baking powder before the public.

BOARD OF HEALTH, SPOKANE: Certainly there is no baking powder known to us equal to the ROYAL.

DR. BINSWANGER, UNIVERSITY OF OREGON: It is also my opinion that there exists no purer, better or stronger baking powder than the ROYAL. I confidently recommend it.

Do not permit the slanderous stories of interested parties to influence you in using any other than The Best, The Royal.

A ROMAN BATH.

It is reported by letter from Naples that at Pesavella-Settermini, near Pompeii, there has lately been excavated on private property a large Roman bath-house, three chambers of which, with mosaic floors and marble baths of artistic design, are in good preservation, as also a roof of some sixty feet long. In these baths the immense boiler is still in its original position, a thing never found in Pompeii itself, and a complete system of tubing, with bronze taps. The find is exciting great interest in archaeological circles.—Philadelphia Ledegr.

The recent letter from the Judge of Awards on Baking Powders at the Chicago World's Fair, exposing the falsity of the claim of a Chicago house that its baking powder had received the highest award for strength, purity, excellence, etc., is a scathing rebuke to those manufacturers of inferior baking powders who have no regard for the truth, but habitually seek, in their public announcements, to deceive consumers. The Judge of Awards states that no such award was given to the Chicago concern, and has notified it that it must cease publishing his name in connection with its false statements.

TURKEY DRIVING.

Will Waterhouse arrived in Jefferson with a drove of 309 turkeys, purchased in the vicinity of Linesville, and drove them over in two days. The driving of turkeys is an easy matter, but when bed time comes that is an end of the drive, as far as the turkeys are concerned. One evening as the flock came to two big maple trees at the side of the road the leader turned his head to one side and looked up into the tree. The next thing he did was to fly up, followed by the entire drove.—Jeffersonville, Penn., Sentinel.

Otis Savage and Frank Klein, the boys who robbed the Pacific Express Company's box of $14,000 on October 13th, at The Dalles, Or., have been sentenced to the penitentiary. Savage received four years and Klein sixteen months.

The Missouri Penitentiary started in business in 1835 with one prisoner.

PHYSICAL STRENGTH,

cheerful spirits and the ability to fully enjoy life, come only with a healthy body and mind. The young man who suffers from nervous debility, impaired memory, low spirits, irritable temper, and the thousand and one derangements of mind and body that result from, unnatural, pernicious habits usually contracted in youth, through ignorance, is thereby incapacitated to thoroughly enjoy life. He feels tired, spiritless, and drowsy; his sleep is disturbed and does not refresh him as it should; the will power is weakened, morbid fears haunt him and may result in confirmed hypochondria, or melancholia and, finally, in softing of the brain, epilepsy, ("fits"), paralysis, locomotor ataxia and even in dread insanity.

To reach, re-claim and restore such unfortunates to health and happiness, is the aim of the publishers of a book of 136 pages, written in plain but chaste language, on the nature, symptoms and curability, by home-treatment, of such diseases. This book will be sent sealed, in plain envelope, on receipt of this notice with ten cents in stamps, for postage. Address, World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y.

For more than a quarter of a century physicians connected with this widely celebrated Institution have made the treatment of the diseases above hinted at their specialty. Thousands have consulted them by letter and received advice and medicines which have resulted in permanent cures.

Sufferers from premature old age, or loss of power, will find much of interest in the book above mentioned.

ORNAMENTING GLASS.

The following is an example of the means of carrying out the inventor's process: A coat of acid resist is laid upon the glass; from the parts forming the background to the design the "resist" is removed with a stencil; soda and hydrofluoric acid are then poured upon the surface. Hydrofluoric acid is next applied; the resist is then removed and the glass is cleaned. The glass is next coated with stain, and by means of a stencil the ornament is freed from the stain, which remains as a protection for the background. The stain is thus burned into the glass. The glass is then taken from the kiln, cleaned, and the required outline traced upon the glass, the background being filled with acid resist. The solution of soda and hydrofluic acid is again poured on so as to leave a white "mat' on the whole ornament, leaving the outline, which is protected by the resist, clear. The shading-in is then done according to the ordinary process of the trade.

A society has been recently established in Chicago entitled "Association of Practical Electricians." The object of this organization, of which Mr. George E. Sanford is president, is the education and advancement of men engaged in electrical work.

A MIRACLE IN TEXAS.

Investigated by the Texas Christian Advocate, and Vouched for by Dr. C. H. Stansbury.

(From the Texas Christian Advocate.)

Our representative has made a careful investigation of the H. E. Spaulding case at Longview, which is here published for the first time, and which will be read with great interest by medical men everywhere. In reply to the Christian Advocate's questions Mr. Spaulding said: About eight years ago while running a locomotive I contracted sciatic rheumatism in my left side from my hip down. It came on slow but sure and in a few months I lost control entirely of that member, it was just the same as if it was paralyzed, I was totally unable to move out of my room for a year and a half, six months of which time I was bed-ridden. I tried every remedy suggested, and had regular physicians in constant attendance on me. I was bundled up and sent to Hot Springs where I spent three months under the treatment of the most eminent specialists, all of which did me no good, and I came back from the springs in a worse condition than when I went. I came home and laid flat on my back and suffered the most excruciating agonies, screaming in pain every time anybody walked across the room, the only ease I obtained being from the constant use of opiates. After three months of this kind of agony, during which time my entire left leg perished away to the very bone, my attention was called to a new remedy called Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, by Mr. Allison who is now train dispatcher at Texarkana, and who was relieved of locomotor ataxia of twenty years duration. At his urgent and repeated solicitation I consented to give them a trial, after taking a few doses I began to improve. I continued taking the pills and kept right on improving until I was finally cured. My leg is just the same size now as the other one, and I am sure that Pink Pills not only cured me but saved my life.

The reporter next visited Dr. C. H. Stansbury, a graduate of one of the medical schools of Kentucky, and a man who enjoys the confidence of everybody in Longview. He said: "I know that Mr. Spaulding had a terribly severe attack of sciatic rheumatism of which I tried to cure him; used everything known to my profession in vain, and finally recommended him to go to Hot Springs. He came back from the springs worse than when he went and I thought it was only a matter of time until his heart would be affected and he would die. I also know that his cure is the direct result of the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

"That is rather an unusual statement for a regular physician to make, doctor."

"I know it is, but a fact is a fact, and there are hundreds of people right here in Longview who know what I say is the truth. I also know Mr. Allison and know that he was relieved of a genuine and severe case of locomotor ataxia of twenty years standing."

BRAVE JANET KING.

By J. H. Connelly.

"Do not raise your voice. Sound travels on the water. We are safe here from being seen, but not from being heard. Why did you dare to come back here?"

"I came to my wife."

"From your wife, you mean."

"No. I don't mean anything of the sort. What do you mean?"

"Hush!"

They stood still, listening to the low grinding sound of an oar rapidly plied as a scull which passed within ten yards of them, and could just discern, dimly outlined against the murky sky, the figure of a man standing in the boat. It was Donald King, going to the beach for the man he proposed to "anchor out." When he had gone by they waded on along the beach parallel with the shore, still keeping only their heads out of water.

"This is terribly hard work," complained Selden. "It would be much easier to swim, if we must stay in the water."

"In this darkness we would lose direction and might go out to sea. The depth guides us."

They struggled on, but the man's impatience could not long be restrained.

"For Heaven's sake, Janet," he appealed to her, "tell me what all this means!"

"It means that I am not going to let my father and brothers stain their souls with murder for the righting of my wrong upon a wretch like you."

"A wretch like me! Why, are you crazy, Janet? I know I've been away a good deal longer than I expected to be, but I can explain"——

"There is no time for explanations now, and they are needless anyway. Facts explain themselves. Your wife and child have been here. That is enough."

"My wife and child! Oh, but this is maddening! I swear to you that I"——

"Take no more oaths, Selden Rangely. Here we have reached a boat, and—yes, thank God! the oars are in it. Climb into it and row for your life! Get away from here as fast and as far as you can. Listen! They have met and found the severed ropes. You hear them cursing. They are in deadly earnest. If they catch you they will kill you like a dog. And you deserve it. I do not save you for your sake, but for theirs. Go back to Philadelphia to your wife, and may God in his justice deal with you as you have deserved by your dealing with me!"

Selden Rangely was momentarily too intensely petrified by astonishment to speak or move. When he had recovered himself Janet had altogether disappeared. Instantly upon the utterance of her last word she had dived and swam away under water, he could not tell in what direction. There was manifestly nothing for him to do but take her advice, for the present at least, so he clambered into the boat, took up the oars and set himself energetically to the putting of as much space as possible between himself and his inexplicable brothers-in-law.

Janet succeeded in unobservedly reentering the house and changing her wet clothing for dry long before her father and brothers came in. Indeed she had retired to her own room and was preparing for bed when she heard them enter, but at the sound of their steps came out again to see that they got the supper left standing in the kitchen for them, and to lightly chide them for their unwonted neglect of the evening meal. They looked at her sharply, but there was nothing in her manner to betray that she knew aught of the contemplated tragedy or had any share in the frustration of their plans.

"Well," she said, having taken up the food before the fire and placed it on the kitchen table, "everything is either cold or dried up now, but you will have to make out with it as you best can. Mother went to bed an hour ago. When you are done throw this cloth over the table. I will clear up the dishes in the morning."

She retired again to her room.

"She had nothing to do with it," affirmed Donald in a low but positive tone, as if in answer to a previously offered suggestion.

"Hadn't we better tell her?" asked Andrew in a whisper.

"No," replied his father. "You can never know beforehand how women will take things; never be sure when they cease to love. I'm afraid the poor girl thinks too much of him even yet. Besides, we've made a poor fist of this night's job, and there's no call to talk about it now or any other time. We had him in our hands and let him get away. The more shame to us!"

"He may have been dazed when he got himself loose and floundered into the surf," suggested Andrew.

"There's some little hope of that," assented the old man, "since he is not on the beach, and we are pretty sure of that. But if he should still be alive, and we get another chance to lay hands on him, there must be no second failure to kill him."

* * * * * * *

Within a week they had another chance. It was on a hot afternoon, when the whole King family were gathered in the shade before the house. Mrs. King sat on the door step knitting; the old man, perched on one end of a water butt, smoked and watched his sons mending a seine that had been torn by a shark; while Janet, standing beside her mother, seemed lost in reverie, her gaze fixed dreamily upon the ocean's lazily heaving waves of green and gold. A broad wheeled beach wagon, drawn by a couple of tough, shaggy little ponies, came creaking from the highway, rounded the corner of the house, and as it drew up before the family group Janet's husband sprang down from beside the driver. At the same moment, from the back seat of the vehicle, leaped a duplicate Selden Rangely—tall, well built, frank faced, flaxen haired and blue eyed as the original—who aided in her descent to the ground a plump little lady with a child in her arms, Mrs. Rangely and Edith.

"Oh, you poor dear!" exclaimed the impulsive Englishwoman, precipitating herself and baby into Janet's arms. "What a lot of trouble I have innocently caused you! But how was I to suppose that Sel had a cousin in this country when they did not themselves know it? How was I to know that there was any other Sel in the world but my Sel?"

Janet's husband took up the burden of explanation.

"I think you will listen to me now, Janet," he said, with a merry twinkle in his eyes. "At all events, you cannot get away from me by diving this time."

David King and his sons looked significantly at each other, and Donald uttered a half suppressed "Gosh!" for those few words made them understand Janet's share in that mysterious escape.

"When I went to the city I found my father very ill. He was a hard, austere man, who had planned my life for me in the way he wanted it, and not I, so we did not get along very well together. But so long as he did not know of my marrying without his consent he softened a great deal toward the last and took me into favor again completely before he died. When he passed away I came back here for my wife, and at her suggestion went to look up any possible Mrs. Rangelys Philadelphia might harbor. You see I have found one, her husband, too; and in so doing discovered a cousin I never dreamed of having. It appears that my father and his brother quarreled in boyhood, and thereafter ignored each other's existence all their lives. But each having a son, gave to him, as it happened, the same old name of Selden, which is historic in our family, and I do not think any one, looking at the resemblance between us, can question our relationship. Now, Janet, my own dear wife, what is my desert?"

"My love and unquestioning trust forevermore," she replied, yielding to his fond embrace.

THE END.

NAPOLEON AT TWENTY.

He Had Even Then Shown Himself Ambitious, Calculating and Masterful.

The new "Life of Napoleon" by Professor William M. Sloane, printed in The Century, gives a striking picture of Napoleon's character at the time of the breaking out of the French revolution. Professor Sloane says:

The appearance of Bonaparte in his twentieth year was not in general noteworthy. His head was shapely, but not uncommon in size, although disproportionate to the frame which bore it. His forehead was wide and of medium height. On each side long chestnut hair—lanky, as we may suppose from his own account of his personal habits—fell in stiff, flat locks over his lean cheeks. His eyes were large, and in their steel blue pupils, lurking under deep arched and projecting brows, was a penetrating quality which veiled the mind within. The nose was straight and shapely, the mouth large, the lips full and sensuous, although the powerful projecting chin diminished somewhat the true effect of the lower one. His complexion was sallow. The frame of his body was in general small and fine, particularly his hands and feet, but his deep chest and short neck were gigantic. This lack of proportion did not, however, interfere with his gait, which was firm and steady. The student of character would have declared the stripling to be self reliant and secretive, ambitious and calculating, masterful, but kindly.

In an age when phrenology was a mania its masters found in his cranium the organs of what they called imagination and causality, of individuality, comparison and locality, by which jargon they meant to say that he had a strong power of imaging and of inductive reasoning, a knowledge of men, of places and of things. The life of the young officer had thus far been so commonplace as to awaken little expectation for his future. Poor as he was and careful of his slim resources, he had, like the men of his class, indulged his passions to a certain degree, but he had not been riotous in his living, and he had not a debt in the world. What his education and reading were makes clear that he could have known nothing with a scholar's thoroughness except the essentials of his profession. But he could master details as no man before or since. He had a vast fund of information and a historic outline drawn in fair proportion and powerful strokes. His philosophy was meager, but he knew the principles of Rousseau and Raynal thoroughly. His conception of politics and men was not scientific, but it was clear and practical. The trade of arms had not been to his taste. He heartily disliked routine and despised the petty duties of his rank. The profession, however, was a means to an end. Of any mastery of strategy or tactics, or even interest in them, he had as yet given no sign, but he was absorbed in contemplating and analyzing the exploits of the great world conquerors. In particular his mind was dazzled by the splendors of the orient as the only field on which an Alexander could have displayed himself, and he knew what but a few great minds have grasped—that the interchange of relations between the east and the west had been the life of the world. The greatness of England he understood to be largely due to her bestriding the two hemispheres.

Up to this moment he had been a theorist and might have wasted his fine powers by further indulgence in dazzling generalizations, as so many boys do when not called to test their hypotheses by experience. Henceforward he was removed from such temptation. His plan for an elective council to replace that of the nobles and for a national militia had been matured. He was a cautious and practical experimenter from the moment he left Auxonne. Thus far he had put into practice none of his fine thoughts or the lessons learned in books. The family destitution had made him a solicitor of favors, and but for the turn in public affairs he might have continued to be one. His own inclinations had made him both a good student and a poor officer. Without a field for larger duties he might have continued as he was. In Corsica his line of conduct was not changed abruptly. The possibilities of greater things dawning gradually, the application of great conceptions already formed, came with the march of events, not like the sun bursting out from behind

A dealer in pictures in New York city says he has noticed that really good prints, etchings and engravings bring more than their market price at auction, and he thinks that the rule of extra high prices for the best applies to all public sales.

According to the director of the United States mint the entire gold product of this country in 1894 was but a little over $33,000,000, scarcely more than a fifth of the promised African annual supply.

JOHN BOYD THACHER A WITNESS.

He Fully Verifies a Disputed World's Fair Award.

John Boyd Thacher is laconic and decisive in his statements. During the lively campaign just closed in New York, this marked him especially as chairman of the Democratic State Committee. It was equally true of him as chairman of the Executive Committee on Awards at the World's Fair. This is the positive and sententious way in which he verifies in an official letter, the honors won by Dr. Price's Baking Powder: "I herewith enclose you an official copy of your award, which in due time will be inscribed in the diploma and forwarded." Thus the question respecting the award, raised by an envious New York rival, is settled beyond cavil. This same rival by the way is widey advertising an award for itself. The official records prove this claim wholly false as they show the New York pretender was not so much as an exhibitor at the World's Fair.

EVOLUTION OF CLOTHING.

Fans came from the East during the Crusades.

Hats were first made in England about 1510.

Silk brocades were first used in the dress of men.

Shoes with heels were first made in Paris in 1527.

English leather gloves were sold all over Europe in 1247.

The widow's cap is as old as the days of Julius Cæsar.

Shoes were not made "rights and lefts" earlier than 1472.

The apron was the first article of clothing—4004 years B. C.

The glove is first mentioned as a common article of dress in 1016.

The huge ruff was brought from Italy to France by Catherine de Medici.

About 1641 the apron was an indispensable part of every lady's dress.

Diaper was first made at Ypres, in Flanders, it is believed, before 1200.

Silk hats began to supersede the old-fashioned beaver or wool hats in 1820.

Handkerchief first came into notice in England during the reign of Elizabeth.

One history of costumes gives 1,847 different styles of head-dresses for women.

Calico was first introduced from Calicut, in India, as stuff for gentlemens' clothes.

Joseph's coat of many colors, probably an embroidered tunic, was made B.C. 1729.

The earliest shoes were simply pieces of hide or skin drawn in purse-fashion around the ankle with a string.

The hoopskirt was in full feather in 1596. It was then made of iron, and sometimes weighed as much as thirty pounds.

In A.D. 394 the breeches-makers were expelled from Rome, and all persons were ordered to discontinue wearing breeches.

Hats of the modern style were first made by a Swiss at Paris in 1404. Before that time hoods and caps were generally worn.

The stove-pipe hat appeared during the war between King and Parliament in England, and has scarcely changed its form from that time to the present.

The buttons at the backs of the coats are a survival. Formerly there was a button-hole in the forward corner of each skirt, and when a gentleman was walking or riding, he turned his skirts and buttoned them to the bottom at his back. The buttons on the wrists of our coats are relics of the days when the sleeves were so long that they covered the tips of the fingers, and the cuffs were turned back and buttoned when the hands were employed.—Globe-Democrat.

The defense in the trial of Meadowcraft Brothers, charged with fraud in connection with the failure of their bank at Chicago, openly tendered to John D. Collins, the witness upon whose testimony an indictment was found, the amount of his deposits and interest. This, it was claimed, cleared their clients of the charge of embezzlement, declaring that under the law embezzlement could not be charged unless the money involved be lost to the depositor. Something of a sensation was created. The Judge took the matter under advisement.

Lady Henry Somerset, one of the most enthusiastic of English Prohibitionists, is the owner of extensive hop yards. The brewers intend seeking revenge by advertising beer made from the genuine Somerset hops.

WILD FIRES.

The devastation and suffering caused by the flames of the wild prairie and forest fires in the West, last summer, has a horrible detail in the loss of life and destruction of property. Men, women and children, by scores, choked by smoke and roasted alive; their homes destroyed, and hundreds maimed and crippled. It is painful to contemplate, but still important and charitable to make it known that St. Jacob's Oil, used according to directions, is one of the best cures for burns and scalds, and should be kept on hand. There is no household that should be without the great remedy for pain, for there are none without the need of it. Little things like slight cuts and wounds it heals and cures like magic, and helps the housework on.

"What an easy-going fellow Tom is! He makes the best of everything." "Or, rather, he takes the best of every thing."—Boston Transcript.

Indigestion Cured

"I suffered with indigestion. Food distressed me very much. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla after meals, and before one bottle was gone I could eat heartily without distress. I have recommended Hood's Sarsaparilla to many. I never heard of its failure to cure. Recently our station agent had the grip. After he was able to get up he had a disagreeable sensation in his head. He said it felt as large as a stove, and he was unable to perform his duties. He took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and after using one and a half bottles he was fully cured. Truly, there is no humbug about Hood's Sarsaparilla."—JOHN BENNETT, Sunman, Ind.

The World's Tribute to Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder Highest Honors Awarded by the World's Columbian Exposition, Chicago, 1893.

World's Fair Medal and Diploma

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder

The highest award was given on every claim, comprising superiority in leavening power, keeping properties, purity and excellence. This verdict has been given by the best jury ever assembled for such a purpose, backed by the recommendation of the Chief Chemist of the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., who made an elaborate examination and test of all the baking powders. This is pre-eminently the highest authority on such matters in America.

This verdict conclusively settles the question and proves that Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is superior in every way to any other brand.

NOTE.—The Chief Chemist rejected the Alum baking powders, stating to the World's Fair jury that he considered them unwholesome.

"My friends," shouted the orator, "the mad rush for the spoils of office is the bitterest eyesore that is eating into the vitals of the body politic!"

"There is one sign that should be placed over every letter-box in the city." "What is that?" "Post no bills."

The firm of E. L. G. Steele & Co., of San Francisco, secured by succession the property in a trade mark known as "Diamond L," which had been patented in 1871 by C. Adolph Low & Co. Under that brand and trade mark E. L. G. Steele & Co. had sold a tea which had become known far and wide for its excellence and in which they had built up a heavy trade. In 1888 the sales of the tea had fallen off so heavily that the firm set an inquiry afoot, and discovered that Lievre, Frick & Co., of San Francisco, were selling a spurious tea under that brand. E. L. G. Steele & Co. compelled them to confess and to promise not to repeat the offense. They appear not to have kept their agreement, however, as this week E. L. G. Steele & Co. brought an action against the same firm, alleging infringement and demanding $50,000 damages. All honest dealers who have built up a business on fair dealing will lend their moral support to the punishment of all such rascality as this. Men who confess their own lack of ability by endeavoring dishonestly to prosper at the expense of more worthy and successful men, and at the same time defraud the community, are enemies of the community and of all honest merchants. E. L. G. Steele & Co. have always been one of the sound and trustworthy institutions of San Francisco, and so long as they had a fair field they could not do otherwise than prosper. A stab in the back, however, is a form of competition in which their integrity does not permit them to embark, and their only recourse is expensive and annoying litigation to protect themselves.

There is no place where ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS do not prove their value. George Augustus Sala, the well known English writer, writing of his trip across the Pacific, says:

"I especially have a pleasant remembrance of the ship's doctor—a very experienced maritime medico, indeed, who tended me most kindly during a horrible spell of bronchitis and spasmodic asthma, provoked by the sea fog which had swooped down on us just after we left San Francisco. But the doctor's prescriptions and the increasing warmth of the temperature as we neared the tropics, and, in particular, a couple of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS clapped on—one on the chest and another between the shoulder blades—soon set me right."

THE WALDENSIANS.

Colony of Hardy Piedmontese in North Carolina.

THEIR STRUGGLE WITH POVERTY.

These Old-world Farmers Have a Horror of Debt—They are Unused to Ordinary Tools.

The Waldensian colony in North Carolina is an experiment in communal settlement. In this it is like the English colony started several years ago at Rugby, Tenn., and the Swiss colonies which have been planted at Alpena and Helvetia, in West Virginia. A Waldensian colony has also been located at Monett, Barry county, Mo., and one near Buenos Ayres, in South America. The North Carolina colony is, therefore, the third which this particular people have made. It is as yet an unsettled question how far such settlements are permanent. Altogether apart from the question of internal management, there seems to be at work in the United States strong diffusive influences which tend to the disintegration of the colony, and the absorption of the colonists into our common American life. These influences, says the Cincinnati "Commercial Gazette," are education, marriage, trade and farming.

From a religious standpoint the interest in this people arises out of their ancient and honorable history. They were a distinct people from early in the twelfth century, when Peter Waldo led their ancestors in the defense of their religious faith against Rome. The historic persecutions of the Waldensians began at that time, and in 1179 they were condemned by ecclesiastical council. Those persecutions continued at intervals until the year 1848.

The Waldensians inhabit certain valleys on the Italian side of the Cottian Alps, southwest of Turin. These valleys are Perosa, San Martino and Lucerna, all of which are on rivers tributary to the River Po. At present the people number about thirty thousand.

Their religious position is that of a church which has never needed to be reformed.

This men colony is composed largely of peasantry from the parish of St Germain, of which Rev. C. A. Tron is pastor. The colony is practically under the superintendence of Pastor Tron, who devised this method of relieving the overcrowded condition of the parish, and affording to the colonists the prospects for development which the new world holds out. For the most part the colonists are not only of the peasantry, but are of the poorer class. Some of them had no land at all at home, and others had holdings of six and ten acres, which they cultivated by the use of the mattock. Their means were just about enough to bring them to America, and on their voyage they had to cast overboard much of their bedding, lest the ship on which they came should be detained in quarantine. They number about fifty families of 320 souls. Of these 100 are under 10 years of age, and seventy-five are between 6 and 21 years of age. There are about eighty children of school age in the colony.

The characteristics of this people are very marked. For centuries they have lived frugally; they are accustomed to hard work and to great privations. Their bread is baked in supplies calculated to last from one to two weeks; it is hard and tough, but at the same time sweet and nutritious. They are amazed at what seems to them the splendor of the American farmers round about them. They are a very honest people with a horror of debt. To this is partly due their present straits, for upon their arrival they paid their little all for their land, reserving nothing with which to provide themselves with food.

In one instance a colonist trudged eight miles away to the neighboring town of Morganton, and agreed with a Morganton merchant for a certain article of merchandise, he to return the next day with the money. According to contract he returned, but in the meantime the merchant had found a customer for the article and sold it. This aroused the ire of the Waldensian very greatly. To him it was beyond understanding that a merchant should break a contract. There has not yet been among them any need for the service of State or county process. To them the line between the State and the church is very hard to draw.

The first house erected was the school house and chapel, and the second house was the mansion. On Sabbath mornings they make their way over mountain roads and through forest trails to the little school house where their ancestral worship is conducted.

They bring with them their hereditary habits of farming—the intensive farming of the continent of Europe. Instead of "deadening" and clearing their farms by the acre, their habit leads them to cultivate a space about the size of a garden spot, to dig out very carefully every stump, to pick off every stone, and to fertilize it heavily, and some of them stubbornly resist the innovation of American methods of farming, in consequence of which they suffer for the necessaries of life. The more progressive among them are gradually learning the American method. They cannot understand the American system of farming; they are unaccustomed to tools, save the simplest, and for them a tree is an object of profoundest reverence. They would rather shiver through the winter than fell a tree. During the cold weather of last winter it was with the greatest difficulty that they were induced to utilize even the dead trees on their land for fuel, and they used it with a frugality that would be amazing to our native American prodigality.

The colony is located in Burke county, North Carolina, which is on the eastern slope of the Blue Ridge Mountains, quite near to the famous thermal belt of Carolina. The lands were chosen by a committee of Waldensians, who traversed the State, and chose them largely because the railroad passes directly through. They were offered much more fertile lands, at a distance of twenty miles from the railroad, but they preferred to be in immediate touch with the outside world.

Some of this land promises well for the ordinary products of American farming, such as corn and wheat, but it was chosen with grape culture in view. It is said that grapes will thrive upon land which is unfit for cereals, and the Waldensians have had long training in the cultivation of grapes. When Dr. Duff, the apostle of India, was returning to his work in 1839, he traveled through the south of France, and "was greatly impressed with the fact that the vine flourishes on slopes and heights where the soil is too poor in gravel to maintain either corn for food or pasturage for cattle. To the vine dressing peasant of Auxerre, an abundant vintage, as connected with his own immediate sustenance, is as important as an overflowing dairy to the pastoral peasant of Ayrshire." What is true of the south of France may also be true of the eastern slopes of the Blue Ridge Mountains.

The terms on which they purchased the land were $2 an acre, for which bonds were given, payable in twenty years, with interest at 5 per cent. There were originally two tracts, one of 7,000, the other of 5,000 acres, but one of these has been given up. The colony is incorporative, with 250 shares, nearly all of which are held by Pastor Tron. The contract provides that if any colonist pays for his land in full he shall have a clear deed, and if not, he shall have twenty years in which to make payment. The colony is divided into four districts, and some of the holdings are six and seven miles distant from the town which has been started, and to which the name of Richmond has been given.

The colony was planted in two sections; the first arrived before Christmas, 1893, and the second in the following spring. At first the colonists were very much crowded, but by this time every man has his own land, with some sort of house upon it. These houses are chiefly frame, and without sufficient protection from the weather, and quite in contrast with the stone houses which they left behind them at home.

The oragnization of the colony is in the hands of two boards—one called the Temporal Board, composed of three Americans and two Waldensians. The chairman of this board is Rev. J. M. Ross, of the Presbyterian Church of Morganton, who sits as the representative of Pastor Tron, and holds his power of attorney. The other is the Moral Board, of which the pastor of the colony, Rev. Barth. Soulier, is the chairman, the other members being the elders of the church. This board has charge of the internal affairs of the colony.

The communal feature of the colony appears in the division of work. Three weeks out of four each man works for himself in the improvement of his own place and house. The fourth week, if he chooses, he works for the colony at the rate of 40 cents a day, the wages being payable in goods at the store. This work consists of road making, bark cutting and lumber sawing. The difficulties which beset this colony are those incidental to all new colonies.

The climate is new, the land is unfamiliar, the social and commercial surroundings are strange. These Waldensians are passing through the same experiences which our forefathers encountered two and three hundred years ago. But the difficulties in their case are enhanced by their extreme poverty. Their history seems to teach one lesson, at least, in communal settlements, which is that these should not be planted unless a sustenance fund can be created. There is acute distress among these people now. Half of the families are without sufficient food.

The wheat crop was a failure, and through their ignorance of the soil the potato crop was a failure; and the corn crop was only partially good. One entire family that was recently visited had only a little corn meal, which was tried into mush, on which to subsist. The utmost they can make under the communal system is $2.40 a week, and that for one week in the month. With no potatoes and no wheat, and a little corn, it is easy to see how scanty must be the subsistence in bread and meat which $2.40 a month affords. Furthermore, the winter is approaching, and the colonists have but scanty protection against it. Their children are for the most part barefoot, having not even the rough sabots to which they are accustomed. The money advanced for supplies at the store is all consumed in bread and flour. Shoes are not to be had, for the simple reason that the people have no money to pay for them.

They are not accustomed to our American shoes. They are more comfortable in the sabots, which are wooden shoes with leather tops, and which they make for themselves.—Mail and Express.

Miss Anna Churchman, aged fifty-two, died at Ashland, Or., a few days ago, from a peculiar cause. In handling a stick of stove-wood, about a week before, she ran a small sliver into one thumb. Shortly afterward she washed out a cloth that had been used in a case of tonsilitis and it is supposed that some of the poison found access to the blood through this slight wound on the thumb. She grew worse and her death resulted.

AN ALAMO HERO.

Colonel Bowie Died With His Boots On.

THE BOWIE KNIFE NAMED AFTER HIM

A Bit of Heroism which will Undoubtedly Prove of Interest to the Rising Generation.

It is a safe wager that nine out of every eleven boys who are proficient in the use of a bowie knife have not the slightest idea where the instrument got its name.

Colonel Bowie, of Texas fame, gave the knife its title.

And when one writes of the Texas hero, one must needs think of the battle of Alamo, that heroic fight of which our American boys and girls seem to think so little and half of them know nothing whatever.

They read how the brave soldiers fought and held the pass of Thermopylæ, but they seldom think of how a mere handful of men defended the Alamo Mission. How they dropped fighting on their knees and then died facing the foe.

If you should go to the historical city of San Antonio, in Texas, you will see the old mission building standing with battered, bullet-pierced walls, a monument to the 172 heroes of '36. Behind these walls the most important battle in the war between Mexico and Texas was fought. That was when Santa Ana was President and the Texans were fighting for their independence. Here it was that Colonel Bowie ended his brave life, dying with his boots on and fighting under the most terrible odds. The story is this, and every American child should know it by heart, that he may tell it with pride when other nations are talking of their great deeds:

One hundred and forty-five men under Captain Travis, a young man of 28, were holding the town of San Antonio against General Santa Ana and 4,000 men. They were the only defenders of the town and were ensconced in the old mission of the Alamo. Davy Crockett was also with them and Colonel Bowie, who was wounded and stretched out on his cot. Of artillery they had only fourteen pieces.

Santa Ana demanded surrender, but the little garrison held out for ten days, skirmishing secretly for food and water. Every shot sent out of the mission house told, but not one of the Alamo heroes were hurt. Patience and strength, however, were being rapidly exhausted. Some of the little band were falling sick, others desperate. Re-enforcements had been appealed for, but none had come. Colonel Lamein with 300 men and four pieces of artillery had started in answer to the appeal, but had put in somewhere for fresh water and food supplies.

At last Captain Smith joined the exhausted band with thirty-two men. Three days after, General Santa Ana ceased the bombarding, and taking advantage of this Captain Travis called his men into line and frankly owned that there was no earthly hope for them; that he had led them into this thinking that re-enforcements were on the way. He does not utter one word against Lamein for failing him; he simply gives them their choice of deaths. They can surrender and be shot down or be killed fighting out their revenge. The Captain drew a line and said: "Every man who is determined to remain here and to die with me will come to me across that line." Every soldier but one crossed at once. When they finished, Colonel Bowie looked up, with his arm in a sling, and cried: "Boys, don't leave me. Won't some of you carry me across?" And the only backward step they made was to go over the line and carry the Colonel to the young captain's side. The man Rose dropped over the wall into a ditch, and was verily the only man who escaped to tell the tale. And then came the terrible day.

Santa Ana brought all his forces to bear on the fortress. The scaling ladders were again and agian raised, but those who placed them were shot down like grain. Four thousand men charging into 175 seemed easy enough, but it soon reduced the 4,000. At last numbers conquered and the Mexicans climbed over into the Alamo. The little band of defenders were trampled on and beaten, but they dropped to their knees and hacked and shot and pierced until the pile of the dead was awful. Colonel Bowie, too weak to rise from his cot, leans on his well elbow and marks his man every time he pulls the trigger. Cut, bleeding, he continues to kill until the pistol drops and the breath leaves his body. Davy Crockett, standing in a corner, fights like a panther, and the young captain, backed against the wall, surrenders only when run through and through.

The great battle is over. The Mexicans have won. Out of the 172 Texans are 172 dead. No Spartans were braver and more tenacious, for they killed 522 of their enemies and wounded 500 more. Texas, though, was finally freed, and whenever great deeds thrill young boy's hearts, they should think of that splendid piece of American daring and say, as Houston said to his men, "Remember the Alamo."—Inter-Ocean.

State Controller Colgan's report shows that the receipts for the two fiscal years were $17,583,493, and expenditures $17,078,647; excess of receipts over expenditures, $504,846. Attention is called to "the alarming increase in the cost to the State of caring for aged persons in indigent circumstances." The expenditures on this account since 1884 amount to $2,542,506.

Preferred Prison to Liberty.

Robert Robinson, better known as "Old Bob," a life convict in the northern prison, died Friday night at the age of 80. Robinson was notorious throughout all the northern part of Indiana among the thousands of excursionists who annually visit the prison as perhaps the first one on record who positively refused a pardon and regarded the prison as an acceptable home.

Robinson was sent to the prison at Jeffersonville, Ind., in 1857 from Wayne county to serve a life sentence for murder. After serving two years there he was transferred with others to this city to assist in building the northern prison. After the labor was finished he worked on contracts until he grew old, and then during the wardenship of the late Charles Mayne in the seventies he became a "trusty" and a farmhand. As he advanced in age his oddities grew upon him. Early in his prison career he formed a strong attachment for dumb animals and made pets of dogs, rabbits, squirrels and foxes. He also developed into a great hunter and trapper and would frequently turn his skill to financial account.

Once during the Mayne regime Bob got lost while hunting in Porter county, west of the city, and actually hired a man to bring him back to the prison. In 1877 Governor Williams offered Robinson a pardon, but he rejected it.—Michigan City Cor. Chicago Tribune.

Through Trains on Trunk Lines.

The 26 west bound trains which run daily on the 8 railroads connecting New York with Chicago average only 8 through passengers each. The joint committee of the Trunk Line and Central traffic associations infers from this small number of through passengers that there are too many through trains running on all the roads. They use this as an argument that the New York Central should not put on its 20-hour limited between New York and Chicago and report that through trains ought to raise their fares as their time is quickened, adding the following extra rates to the regular fares:

Twenty-six hours	$3
Twenty-four and one-half hours	6
Twenty-two and one-half hours	8
Twenty and one-half hours	10

This would make the cost of a trip on the Central's 20-hour limited, with $5 for the sleeping car, $35 each way, or $70 for the round trip.

The attempt to gauge the profits of running through trains by the number of through passengers is in the highest degree fallacious.—New York Advertiser.

Criticism of a New Yorker.

The most insignificant atom in all creation has its uses. A foolish little dirty wisp of straw may show which way the wind blows. The bristle of a pig may be utilized for scrubbing purposes. And although it is hard to see at first what possible cause so infinitesimal a molecule as that tiny bit of dried up, grayish matter known as the brain of Ward McAllister may subserve, certain it is that even that apparently worthless bit of sponge may point a moral and disfigure—not adorn—a tale to some purpose. At the sight of the great prince of bottle washers and menu makers our scorn will vanish, and we shall be lisping cringingly, as I heard a Chicago belle murmur to a New Yorker the other day, "I am afraid you find us very crude after New York." That is the way to invite contempt. If we run to Ward McAllister or after him and vie with each other in filling his jaded maw with the best our chefs afford, we shall be as bad as he.—Chicago Post.

Crowds In London.

English reporters can never agree upon the number of people in a crowd. Estimates of the numerical strength of the eight hours' meeting in Hyde park ranged from 30,000 to 500,000, while the actual number was probably about 100,000. The figures given in connection with Wednesday's loyal demonstration differed almost as absurdly, the lowest estimate being 150,000 and the highest 750,000. Police calculation, which is generally fairly reliable, puts the number at 300,000, reckoning people all along the route. At some favorite spots the crush was tremendous, but there were surprisingly few casualties. The Metropolitan corps of the St. John Ambulance brigade was on duty. The staff consisted of 3 surgeons, 12 ambulance officers, 11 nursing sisters and 81 rank and file, while the transport consisted of 4 pairs horse ambulance wagons, a wheeled litter and 30 stretchers. A hundred and fifty cases were treated, mostly faints.—London Letter.

The Jersey Peach Crop.

A letter from Flemington, N. J., says: Two hundred and ninety replies to 300 inquiries sent out to the largest peach growers in this part of the state regarding the prospects for this year's crop substantially report that the prospects for a very large crop are good. The cold spring weather retarded the growth of peach buds until the late frosts were over. The buds are opening now and are healthy in appearance. In the year of a full crop Hunterdon county has yielded 1,500,000 baskets. It is expected that that number will be exceeded this year. Similar encouraging reports come from Warren, Somerset and Sussex counties, where the peach interest has greatly developed in the last five years.

The Oldest Inhabitant Gone.

Amos Andrew Parker of Fitzwilliam, N. H., died Friday.

He had several titles to fame, the chiefest being that he was probably the oldest person in New England. He had reached the truly remarkable age of 101 years 7 months and 4 days, and up to the very last all his bodily and mental faculties were in an excellent state of preservation. He was graduated from the University of Vermont in 1813 in a class of 10 members, the next oldest of whom died in 1872.

Mr. Parker was an editor and lawyer. The journalistic profession is surely not conducive to longevity, so that the case is a very remarkable one.—St. Johnsbury (Vt.) Republican.

LOVE'S POWER.

Life may change, but it may fly not.
Hope may vanish, but can die not;
Truth be veiled, but still it burneth;
Love repulsed—but it returneth.

Yet were Life a charnel where
Hope lay coffined with Despair;
Yet were Truth a sacred lie,
Love were lust—if Liberty

Lent not life its soul of light,
Hope its iris of delight,
Truth its prophet's robe to wear,
Love its power to live and bear.

—Shelley.

AN ACCOMMODATING DRIVER.

He Was Also Superintendent, So He Could Do as He Pleased.

"They have a delightful way of being accommodating in some parts of the south," said a gentleman who had traveled considerably in that section. "Of course it wouldn't do anywhere else in the world, but the way those people forget all about time is absolutely refreshing.

"I was down south once and had occasion not to patronize but to be patronized by a little street car line running from L—— to L—— Junction. The length of the line is half a mile and its equipment two cars, each with a single mule attachment. The official roster is condensed to the name of a single gentleman wearing a suit of Confederate gray, who fills every position on the line from superintendent to driver with perfect satisfaction to his patrons, and I must say with seeming satisfaction to himself. In his capacity of driver he was told that I would like to go down to the junction at a certain time.

"In his capacity as superintendent I was introduced to him, and assuming the authority of his highest position he advised me that he would wait for me near a certain corner. I was watching for him, and about 10 minutes before the appointed time the car stopped on the corner designated. The driver set the brake, but it was the big hearted superintendent who got down to play with the children by the roadside until I should arrive. He greeted me cordially, and we started, with the mule in a canter.

"A man hailed the car from a house a little farther on, and we came to a stop. There was a short conversation in loud tones. Then the driver carefully wound the lines around the brake and went into the house. In about five minutes he reappeared, with a trunk on his shoulder, having probably stopped to tie a rope around it inside the house. This trunk he deposited on the front platform, and we were again going as fast as the mule could travel.

"Arrived at the junction, the driver was again transformed to the superintendent as he shook hands with me and bade me goodby. I told him I had enjoyed my trip immensely, and that he was the most accommodating man I had ever met in the transportation service. He promised to call on me in Chicago, and I'll be glad to see him too."—Chicago Post.

The Nile by Night.

"I suppose no professional 'globe trotter' is ever satisfied," said James T. Hurd of New York, "without a sojourn in Alexandria and a voyage of four or five weeks up the Nile. The river itself, I must say, did at first sadly disappoint me. We Americans are apt to be rather exacting in the matter of rivers, naturally enough, considering the beauty and grandeur of our own. When I saw the strong stream in the hot sunshine, looking like floating mud rather than water, I hated to believe it the Nile of my dreams. Beauty, majesty and power, not utility, were what I wanted to see in the historic river. But when the sun went down and the moon gilded, not silvered, the stream, then it became indeed the river of my imagination. The unsightly banks, which by day were steep walls of black mud, like huge unbaked brick, became picturesque and even beautiful, with waving groves of palm and fields of grain."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

She Pounded a Cartridge.

A woman of Carrolton, Ky., thought that she would be able to stop a leak in the bottom of an iron pot by driving a piece of lead into it. So she got one of her husband's pistol cartridges out of a drawer and began the driving process with a hammer. Now, the good lady didn't understand the philosophy of a cartridge and never dreamed that it would explode from the concussion of a hammer, seeing no powder about the thing. But there is no knowledge as that which comes from experience, although the price paid in that way is sometimes very high. This cartridge exploded, and the flesh of the thumb and finger with which she held it was considerably torn. And that old pot still leaks as it did before.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

True Pugilistic Grief.

If ever genuine grief was mingled with true fidelity to a departed friend, the combination was exhibited by Charles Mitchell when he heard of the death of Squire Abingdon. The pugilist shed copious tears, blubbered aloud and said between his sobs, "He was good to me, and I'll show what I thought of him by punching hades out of Jim Corbett in six rounds." Who can fail to be impressed by this display of dauntless spirit in the midst of solemnity of a crushing bereavement? As for Corbett, if he is not willing to be punched in such a sacred cause, he is simply a hard hearted monster.—Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

The Maple Sugar Crop.

"The maple sugar crop of Vermont," says Colonel B. B. Smalley of that state, "is going to be very short this season. I know that this is a sad fact to communicate to an expectant public, but it is nevertheless unfortunately true. They need cold, frosty nights and warm days to make the sap flow, but unhappily all conditions have been against a good crop. I am also informed that the pear crop of Georgia will be short, while if the peach crop of Delaware also peters out the country at large will indeed be in a deplorable condition."—New York Tribune

Idiotic Actions of Women.

Throughout the whole miserable Carlyle Harris business certain women have made themselves disagreeably conspicuous by an unwholesome display of mawkish sentiment, but it remained for a few fanatics near Albany to give the display the finishing touches. The decoration of a murderer's grave by feminine sympathizers apart from the family and near friends was bad enough, but the subsequent raid on and spoliation of the flowers by a lot of idiotic women exceeds all patience. These women waited until the mourners had departed, then rushed forward and seized the flowers. They may have been actuated by different motives. Some doubtless wished a precious souvenir of the departed, others perhaps merely took the flowers as a curiosity to be exhibited to their friends. But in any case the exhibition was offensive in the last degree, and more's the pity that the women were not arrested for trespass.

It seems almost useless to preach to women on the absurdities of the exhibitions made over the last hours of murderers, but the Harris case and its conclusion have necessitated a strong remonstrance. The conduct of such women is almost as much an instigation as a condonation of murder. To hold them up to the public and private scorn and reproach is a duty that cannot be too rigorously observed.—New York World.

Ladies With a Fighting Partner.

A rather curious institution is arising in Paris—that of dueling associates of lady journalists. On Saturday the lady known as Mme. Severine, who was intimately connected as a friend, literary helper and disciple of M. Jules Valles, contributed an article to The Journal, at which a M. Massard, a socialist, took offense. He called on M. Xau, the editor, to ask for satisfaction.

It being impossible to call Mme. Severine out, the answer was that, in virtue of a fiction adopted for the purpose of releasing M. Xau from all responsibility in such cases, Mme. Severine was supposed to be the joint author with M. Labruyere of all her articles. He had agreed to be answerable for any offense she might give.

M. Massard then sent seconds to M. Labruyere, who, admitting that he was the fighting partner of the lady, referred them to a couple of male friends. The duel, which has taken place, was a fierce affair. It was fought with foils. In the second round M. Labruyere received a cut on the chin, but the doctors saying that it did not signify, there were five other rounds. The combat was ended by M. Massard running his foil through the forearm of M. Labruyere. Honor was then declared satisfied, and M. Labruyere was driven back to Paris.—London News.

The Place of Meeting.

One of the Salvation Army recruits, sent to a certain inland town of California, was a young lady of fine social position and savoir faire. She was also very beautiful. Her arrival greatly agitated the chappies, who flocked to the street meetings. Finally one young blood made a bet that he would secure an appointment with the beauty for that same night, and approaching her after the meeting he slipped into her hand a $20 goldpiece. She put it in her pocket. "And—ah—where shall I meet you by and by?" pursued the masher. "In heaven, I hope," placidly answered the lassie as she walked away with the golden double eagle.—San Francisco Argonaut.

Obeying the New Immigration Law.

All the agents of the transatlantic steamship companies which carry steerage passengers to this port have now agreed to respect the new immigration rules, and to do their share in the enforcement of them. It will assuredly be to their advantage to perform this duty faithfully and to co-operate properly with Dr. Jenkins and Commissioner Senner. They are liable to heavy penalties for neglgence. Those of them who have striven to evade the new regulations must not be permitted to trifle any longer with the public safety. Instead of their interests conflicting in any way with ours, the interests of both parties are the same.—New York Sun.

High Commercial Morality.

Springfield's commercial morality will compare well with that of any other city. Only a few days ago the directors who held the controlling interest in one of our prosperous local corporations were offered a heavy advance for their stock, but declined unless every stockholder had the same opportunity. In another instance gentlemen who bought stock below par in a local concern made up the shrinkage to the family of the seller as soon as the business got well under way, although they were under no moral or legal obligation to do so. These are pleasant facts.—Springfield (Mass.) Homestead.

Our Friend the Earl, Ye Know.

Through the death of the late Earl of Derby a blue ribbon of the Order of the Garter is at the disposal of Mr. Gladstone. The honor of wearing this badge is much sought after. It will be gratifying to many Chicagoans to learn that it is likely to be conferred on the Earl of Aberdeen, who was recently in this city.—Chicago Tribune.

Mention is made of lands sold for $277,000 that were bought of aborigines for a jug of whisky. It might be useful to complete the list of all the lands worth $277,000 that have been sold for a jug of whisky and not by red aborigines either.

Strange [illegible] on a Spring D[illegible].

An entirely trustworthy friend of the Listener's informs him that on last Sunday in Middleton, 20 miles from Boston, grasshoppers were seen hopping about in a lively manner. On the same day a man was seen walking across Middleton pond on the ice.—Boston Transcript.

Mrs. Alma Norstrum, a pretty young Swedish woman of Kansas City, became violently insane a few days ago while singing "Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay" and has kept up the song almost unceasingly ever since.

REPRESSION.

Oh, sing a song to delight the world,
And play sonatas most sweet and rare!
Oh, send hope's message to heart-sick souls,
And banish from earth all carking care!

Ah! pinioned the hands that erstwhile played,
And hushed the voice that longeth to sing,
Repressed the life, as the prisoned bird
That beateth the bars with tiring wing.

Perchance in the fuller, broader sphere
That cometh when these short years are o'er,
The yearning soul—ah, then free indeed!—
Is ne'er repressed on the other shore.

—Fanny L. Fancher in Minneapolis Housekeeper.

THE ENGAGED YOUNG MAN.

He Who Follows These Rules Shall Be Happy In His Betrothal.

It will be well for the man who expects to sail smoothly into the matrimonial port to continue those flattering attentions after his engagement which preceded it. It will not suffice for him to talk of what he is saving to make their little home worthy of her. He must, by some magic, be able both to save money for the future and to provide her with the flowers, books, bonbons, theater tickets and other trifles which he bestowed upon her when there was no future to be taken into consideration.

He must treat her people with deference, cordiality and filial affection. He must let her complain of all their faults, retail all the family quarrels and point out all the family imperfections without ever allowing the knowledge he acquires thus to tinge his behavior. He must listen to her abuse of them with sympathy and never by any chance show anything but the highest regard for them himself.

He must like all her friends. He must treat "the girls" with the intimacy which never borders on familiarity; must enjoy their society, which will be thrust upon him at all times and places, and at the same time must be prepared to agree with her estimate of their shortcomings. It will be just as well for him never to admire them too extravagantly.

In public he must always be prepared to show her the attention she needs, but must also be prepared to let her "have a good time," unhampered by his devotion. For instance, he must never let her sit out a dance alone, yet he must never glower when she seems to be dancing often with other men. His manner must be a perfect mingling of devotion and noninterference.

Incidentally it may be added that an occasional dose of neglect is wholesome, and that a semioccasional quarrel is not to be despised.—Philadelphia Times.

That Despot, the Editor.

The despotism of editors is not so arbitrary as it used to be. My memory does not go back to the fear in which the quarterly, "so savage and slaughterly," used to be held. One would have supposed it took its name from its quartering as well as executing its victims. In my time nobody cared much for the attacks of the heavier reviews, partly perhaps because they were generally belated and did not bear down upon authors until their reputations had been established, but the power of the weekly organs of literature was still considerable. The then editor of The Athenæum, Hepworth Dixon, was greatly feared by the small fry of literature and not much liked by the large fry.

It is well known that Thackeray had objections to his daughter becoming an authoress, from the apprehension of what Dixon might write of her work. I remember as a young man, when speaking rather gushingly of the kindness I had received from editors in Dickens' presence, he observed with a droll look that he concluded I had not yet made the acquaintance of Hepworth Dixon. I had met him, however, at dinner and had had rather a humorous experience of him.

I was sitting next to a great eastern scholar, who had told me quite as much as I wanted to hear of Assyria and was still going on, when he was suddenly interrupted by the host, who, in a tone of conciliatory reproof, observed: "Professor So-and-so, silence if you please. Mr. Hepworth Dixon is about to say something." I forget what he said, but the rout of the Assyrian was complete and amused me exceedingly.—James Payn in Cornhill Magazine.

Chicken Surgery In Florida.

A maranding hawk made an attack on a Lakeland (Fla.) fowlyard and succeeded in ripping a chicken's craw entirely from its body, so that it dragged on the ground, and also cutting a hole through the craw, so that it would not hold food. A day or two afterward the owner caught it, and one of the ladies of the family performed a surgical operation. The craw was sewed up, the chicken was soaked in hot water until the wounded and dry skin was made elastic again, the craw was restored to its place, the wound sewed up, and now that is about the healthiest chicken in the yard.

FRIDAY, FEB. 8.....1895

The news from Nebraska is so sad that it is almost heartrending. There has been no rain to speak of in Western Nebraska for five years, and a region which was once a picture of happiness and fertility is a desert in which neither man nor cattle can live. When the old schoolbooks were printed they informed the pupil that the limit of cultivation westward was the hundredth parallel. West of that crops would not grow for want of rain. Nevertheless, when the great tide of western migration filled up the eastern counties of Kansas and Nebraska, after the war, hardy adventurers pushed on westward and broke the sod on the North Fork of the Platt and along the Republican river. It happened, curiously enough, that their arival was accompanied by unusual falls of rain. The years from 1875 to 1888 were almost all Wet years. The rivers were brimfull, the streams did not dry up, the sloughs always contained water, and the soil was always moist and prepared to grow corn. Scores of little towns sprang up by the side of the rail-road, every train brought new settlers, and there was no part of the United States more prosperous than the region which the geographes had pronounced uninhabitable. This happy era lasted till the opening of the present decade. Then there came a summer without rain, and of course without crops. This was followed by another and yet another, until the climax was capped in 1894, when the Republican ran dry and the corn made no pretense of growing at all. Then the settlers, who had run deeply into debt in the years of plenty to increase the size of their farms, not only gave up all hope of saving their holdings, but actually lay down to starve. A traveler who has just passed through Nebraska says that the early corn never came up at all. There is no grass, not even buffalo grass, for the little patches which survived last summer have been gnawed down by the roaming herds. The country is a dead baked brown, like some of our southern plateaus before the rainy season. Farmers have killed their stock to eat, and are abandoning their farms in search of more hospitable homes. Others, who do not know where to go, are living on the weeds which grow around the mouths of their wells and their garden spots; some of them have actually died of starvation.

A four-thousand ton steamer, loaded with passangers and steering west, was run into at 4 or 5 oclock on a dark, windy morning thirty miles from the coast of Holland, by a small steamer steering north, and was sunk in twenty minutes with nine-tenths of her human freight. It is the story of the Arctic, which was sunk by the French steamer Vesta, forty years ago, off the coast of Newfoundland. We are not informed whether the Elbe was built in compartments, but it is presumable that she was not, as, had she been so constructed, she would not have filled so quick. The Cathie struck her abaft the port bow, just about the engine room, and having driven her bow through the Elbe's plates, backdd out and let the water into the doomed ship. Had the Cathie left her bow in the hole she had made the Elbe might have floated some time longer and all hands might havh been saved. The sudden disappearance of the former after the collision calls for explanation; it may possibly turn out that she was seriously damaged herself and that her captain thought only of his own ships safety. That was the reason the captain of the Vesta gave for abandoning the Arctic. [illegible]

If the year keeps up the movement of the first month, it will be a lively one. Thus far it has given us a new President in France, a royalist uprising in Hawaii, a threat of war between Mexico and Guatemala, one of the biggest strikes on record in Brooklyn, a well-launched movement for a competing road in San Francisco, and a practical overthrow of the bosses of all parties in California.

A man never becomes a crank by getting new ideas, but by eternally grinding at an old one.

HE HAD HEARD ENOUGH.

How Senator Palmer Fooled His Old Friend, the Judge.

An old Republican judge from Illinois on his way west from New York stopped over in Washington long enough to have, as he intended, a little fun with his old friend, Senator Palmer. The senator's committee room was rather full when the judge entered, and he felt a bit diffident. Still, after clasping the senator's hand in a grip of friendship, he said, with a grin:

"What do you think of the election?"

"Hey?" the senator, with his hand behind his ear, replied. The judge, something surprised at this, to him, the first sign of deafness in his old friend, said in a louder tone:

"I say, what do you think of the election?"

"Sir?" said the senator, with his hand still behind his ear and bending near the judge.

"I say," the judge loudly responded, turning a bit red as he saw that every one had stopped talking to listen to him, "I say, what—do—you—think of the—election—the election—the—election?"

The senator looked pained, as he does when he has to turn down a needy office seeker. He glanced around, as if to read the judge's question in the faces of those present, and then, apparently failing, he turned again to the judge, and without even so much as a twinkle in his eyes thrust his ear to the judge's mouth and said:

"W-h-a-t?"

This drove the spirit of victorious and gloating fun from the judge's mind.

"Dear me," he said in a low voice full of sympathy and regret, "I had no idea that my old friend John had become deaf."

Then he shook the senator's hand and left the room, whereupon the senator turned to those present and winked the other eye.—Washington Post.

TOOK THE SHORTEST CUT.

French Detectives Improve an Opportunity to Do a Clever Piece of Work.

Paris is laughing today over the undoing of two extremely smart burglars. Two detectives were in the Rue St. Martin. Their attention was attracted to a man pushing a large packing case on a cart along the street. The man was apparently talking to himself. They overheard the remark: "Don't be afraid, old fellow. I will take the shortest cut." Arriving at the Rue de Bondy, he deposited the packing case in the warehouse of a merchant named Roux. The detectives concealed themselves in the warehouse for the night. About midnight a man issued from the packing case. He was provided with a set of burglars' tools and set to work to demolish the lock of the safe. The operation took a long time, but at last the door flow open, and the robber filled his pockets with gold and silver. He withdrew once more into the case, which closed upon him.

The detectives were in no hurry to handcuff the thief, but awaited the return of his confederate. In the morning he presented himself to take away the case and was arrested before entering the warehouse.

The detectives placed the case on a handcart and dragged it to the office of the police commissary. On the way they acted the part of the accomplice. When the man in the box inquired, "Is that you?" a detective replied: "Yes, old boy. Don't be uneasy. I will take the shortest cut." This ingenious robber was greatly surprised when he arrived at his destination to find himself in the presence of a police commissary.—Paris Letter.

The New Empress of Russia.

Russian society as distinct from the court circle proper is not very elated at the czar's marriage with the German princess. They would have preferred as their future czarina the Princess of Montenegro. To begin with, the princess had grown up under their own eyes. She belongs to their own nation. Her father's name is very popular. The hero of Dulcigno is a kind of minor idol. Furthermore, the aristocracy would have looked upon that marriage as the beginning of the fulfillment of the resuscitated idea of "Russia for the Russians." What they dislike above all is the idea of German influence becoming once more preponderant at the Russian court. They were absolutely at peace in that respect with regard to the now dowager czarina. The daughter of Denmark did not owe the Germans much good will, and she is honest enough not to disguise her feelings.—St. Petersburg Correspondent.

Say Mount Ranier Smokes and Steams.

The exploring party has fully confirmed the previous statements that smoke has ascended from the summit of Mount Ranier in the last two months, for the explorers are now camped on the side of the mountain over half way to the summit and have actually seen great volumes of smoke and geysers of steam pouring from the crater. The top of the mountain was fully five miles away, and jets of steam like geysers shot upward 200 feet or more, and farther to the right a column of densely black smoke rose from the crater in fitful curls to a height of several hundred feet. This news was brought by a homing pigeon.—Seattle (Wash.) Dispatch.

Another Convert to Individual Cups.

The Warren Avenue Baptist church has discussed the matter of individual communion cups, and upon the recommendation of the committee appointed two months ago it was voted to adopt them. Deacons Wentworth and Sawyer and Mr. C. M. Barrett were chosen to select the cups. The church has about 700 communicants.—Boston Herald.

Dairy and Creamery.

Handle butter with a wooden scoop and ladle and never under any circumstances touch it with your hands.

Steam heat is very good to warm a cheese curing room.

If you make butter at all, you might as well make it right and have the modern tools and conveniences. The hand lever butter worker is well adapted to the home dairy. The way to use it to the best advantage is to lift the butter from the churn upon it. Run the lever across the butter to flatten it out and sprinkle salt upon it at the rate of half an ounce to the pound. Then put a wooden ladle under the edges of the mass of butter and bring it up into a lump in the center of the worker. Next raise the lever and push it straight down upon the mass. Make several strokes of the lever up and down upon the butter till it is flattened out again. Then draw it into a lump in the center and repeat the process till the buttermilk is all pressed out, not a minute longer. Do not roll the lever from side to side upon the butter, but always work it up and down. The rolling and grinding from side to side crush the butter globules and make an oily mass.

A brick or stone curing room is the best for cheese. Where a man cannot afford this he can build a curing room with a double wooden wall. The inside wall should be tongued and grooved, the outer one well matched. Leave a foot of space between and fill it with sawdust. Finish the ceiling overhead in the same way. Have the floor also double and put between the two layers two thicknesses of good building paper. This will keep the room moist enough to properly cure cheese.

The largest single industry in the Union is probably the dairy business in its various branches. It represents an invested capital of $4,000,000,000, and the annual income from it is $1,000,000,000. There are 20,000,000 milk cows in the United States.

Half pound and pound butter prints are very popular among private customers. A good way to save time in printing is to have a two pound print made, with an exact mark or division in the center of the upper part of the print, so that from this mark one may see exactly where to cut the butter into pound prints. Half and quarter pound prints may be indicated in the same way, so that the butter maker need not be at the trouble of printing each little pat separately. The butter can best be sliced apart at the divisions with a clean, thin, flat slip of wood.

Changing Size of Hive Entrance.

The editor of The American Bee Journal says: As a matter of actual practice, I think most beekeepers leave the entrance the same the year round, although those who winter in cellars and who do not give upward venilation prefer to have the entrance much enlarged while in the cellar, even to taking away the bottom board entirely. If there is any time when it seems profitable to lessen the entrance, I should say it is when first flights begin in spring, so as to save the heat as much as possible for breeding purposes.

Our Fair Appropriation.

The following letter appeared in this week's issue of the Index and copies of the same have been sent to Senators Voorhies and Linder and Assemblyman Coleman:

Sir:—By direction of the Board of Directors of Agricultural District No. 18, State of California, comprising the counties of Alpine, Inyo and Mono, I have the honor to advise you that, since the organization of the District in 1887, there has been received in State appropriations the gross sum of $22,000, which amount has been supplemented by receipts from private subscriptions and other local sources to the extent of $12,500, or more than 50 per cent added to the amount of State appropriations for the benefit of said 18th District.

The State money has always been used within the law, for the payment of premiums, printing, salaries and other necessary expenses, while all race purses and like charges have been paid by local subscriptions.

During the last two years, (1893—1894), for which the appropriation was $6,000, there has been paid in premiums on Agricultural and Live Stock exhibits the net sum of $3,853 50, or about 66 per cent of the entire appropriation. These premiums have been equitably distributed to exhibitors throughout the entire District and not confined to one locality.

Your attention is particularly directed to these facts, for the reason that it has been charged that State money has been squandered at District Fairs in horse-racing and kindred sports, which is certainly not true as regards the 18th District, wherein the State money has been conscientiously applied as required by law.

Our Annual Fairs have been held alternately at Independence and Bishop, the chief towns and agricultural sections of the District, thus best accommodating all his people, and have proved a source of great benefit to this remote portion of California.

It is the earnest desire of all citizens and taxpayers of the Eighteenth District that the biennial State Appropriations shall be continued, to the end that our resources and productions may be further developed and advanced. While our people, as shown above, have always contributed liberally to the expenses of these Annual Fairs, and will gladly continue to do so, the conditions here existing are such that the District Agricultural Association must go out of existance if the State appropriations cease.

Very respectfully,

B. H. YANDELL,

Secretary, District No. 18.

Independence Feb 1, 1895.

In The Superior Court.

Wednesday morning the case of the people vs. Indian George was called. A jury was secured before noon consisting of the following men

A. Stecker
W. F. Matlack
John Keegan
W. H. Mitchell
F. Lawrence
Dave Vaughn
W. L. Hunter
F. Albers
W. M. Boyd
J. E. Shepherd
N. Scargo
Neil McLean

The examination of witnesses occupied the remainder of the day and until about ten o'clock Thursday morning at which time the case was given to the jury, who in fifteen minutes returned a verdict of not guilty. The defendent was immediately discharged, and the court then took a recess until 1 o'clock p. m. at which time reconvened. The case of the people of the State of California vs. Arthur Mateer, charged with perjury, was then called, and a jury was quickly secured consisting of the following men:

Fred Albers
Alexander Clark
W. L. Hunter
George H. Lewis
Frank Lawrence
W. H. Mitchell
W. F. Matlack
Neil McLean
Jacob Pfohl
David Scubblefield
David Vaughn
Thomas Webb

The witnesses for the prosecution and defense were then called into court and sworn, after which the examination of witnesses was begun. The case will probably be given to the jury this afternoon. The case of McGee vs. Givens has been set for hearing tomorrow.

Posted a dime on a sheet of paper and send to Crocker & Ames, 619 Montgomery St., San Francisco, for Ame's Shoe Protector, the wonderful saver of shoes.

A west-Bound Southern Pacific train was held up in Arizona January 30. The amount secured by the robbers was not made public by the rail road and express officials.

Services will be held at Keeler next Sunday morning. The choir will sing the following selections: "Praise Ye Forever," "Still, Still With Thee," "Shall I Let Him Go?" and "Bringing in the Sheaves."

All western roads have now recorded their votes on the question of advancing one way and round trip rates to the Pacific Coast, and the vote is unmistakably for a raise, which will take effect February 15.—Enterprise.

Mr. C. A. Walker of Camp Independence wishes to state that a rumor accusing the older boys of Camp Independence of trying to set fire to the school house is false. He feels that this statement should be made in simple justice to the boys and their parents.

The Inquisitive Betty.

Our allusion in a recent issue to ladies who have been initiated into the order of Freemasons has brought to us an interesting series of letters. Strangely enough, The Masonic Visitor supplies us with a complete reply to the main queries propounded. That organ declares that the "only sister" was the Hon. Mrs. Aldworth, better known perhaps as the Hon. Betty St. Ledger, who first saw the light of this world in 1695, and who was the daughter of Sir Arthur St. Leger, afterward Baron Kilmagdow and Viscount Doneraile. The story turns, according to the same authority, on these lines: The honorable and inquisitive Betty stole on tiptoe into the room adjoining the apartment in which the lodge was being held, and having removed a brick with the aid of her scissors she, via the friendly aperture, witnessed the mysterious ceremony. The members of the lodge promptly proceeded to deal with the intruder. The lady was duly initiated.

She attended all the Masonic assemblies in Cork and generally added luster to the craft which had so reluctantly adopted her as its first and only sister. The Hon. Elizabeth St. Leger married Mr. Richard Aldworth, M. P., of Newmarket, County Cork, and having outlived her brothers, who were childless, the family estates passed to her, and at her death her second son, Mr. St. Leger Aldworth, as the mother's heir, succeeded to the estates, and obtaining a recreation of a title became Viscount Doneraile, from whom the present family have descended. Her portrait, in Masonic clothing, hangs in many an Irish lodge-room, and her apron is still preserved at Newmarket House, Cork. It was exhibited at the Grand Munster stall at the great Masonic bazaar in Dublin in 1892, when over £20,000 was raised for the Masonic girls' schools. The jewel worn by the lady Freemason is now in the possession of No. 1 lodge, Cork.—London Lady.

The doorkeeper of the British house of commons retired the other day after a service of 37 years and was succeeded by his first assistant. The place is a valuable one, both because of its salary, its permanence and its dignity.

FOR MODERN COOKING.

As a matter of useful information it may be stated that whenever a cooking receipt calls for a baking powder the "Royal" should be used. The receipt will be found to work better and surer, and the bread, biscuit, rolls, cakes, dumplings, crusts, puddings, crullers, or whatever made, will be produced sweeter, lighter, finer flavored, more dainty, palatable and wholesome. Besides, the "Royal" will go further or has greater leavening power, and is therefore more economical than any other powder.

Many receipts as published still call for cream-of-tartar and soda, the old-fashioned way of raising. Modern cooking and expert cooks do not sanction this old way. In all such receipts the Royal Baking Powder should be substituted without fail.

The greatest adepts in the culinary art are particular to use the Royal only, and the authors of the most popular cook books, and the teachers of the successful cooking schools, with whom the best results are imperative, are careful to impress their readers and pupils with the importance of its exclusive employment.

The Royal Baking Powder is the geatest help of modern times to perfect cooking, and every receipt requiring a quick-raising ingredient should embody it.

Golden Medical DISCOVERY

Cures Ninety-eight per cent. of all cases of Consumption, in all its Earlier Stages.

Although by many believed to be incurable, there is the evidence of hundreds of living witnesses to the fact that, in all its earlier stages, consumption is a curable disease. Not every case, but a large percentage of cases, and we believe, fully 98 per cent. are cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, even after the disease has progressed so far as to induce repeated bleedings from the lungs, severe lingering cough with copious expectoration (including tubercular matter), great loss of flesh and extreme emaciation and weakness.

Do you doubt that hundreds of such cases reported to us as cured by "Golden Medical Discovery" were genuine cases of that dread and fatal disease? You need not take our word for it. They have, in nearly every instance, been so pronounced by the best and most experienced home physicians, who have no interest whatever in misrepresenting them, and who were often strongly prejudiced and advised against a trial of "Golden Medical Discovery," but who have been forced to confess that it surpasses, in curative power over this fatal malady, all other medicines with which they are acquainted. Nasty cod-liver oil and its filthy "emulsions" and mixtures, had been tried in nearly all these cases and had either utterly failed to benefit, or had only seemed to benefit a little for a short time. Extract of malt, whiskey, and various preparations of the hypophosphites had also been faithfully tried in vain.

The photographs of a large number of those cured of consumption, bronchitis, lingering coughs, asthma, chronic nasal catarrh and kindred maladies, have been skillfully reproduced in a book of 160 pages which will be mailed to you, on receipt of address and six cents in stamps. Address for Book, World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y.

A FRENCH GIRL'S FEAT.

How She Changed Her Clothes In a Day Coach Without Shocking Any One.

"Savoir faire" of the French Frenchy is without a synonym in the English language. It properly belongs to a race that intuitively follows the old adage, "What's worth doing is worth doing well." They are adepts in the art of diplomacy. Under trying circumstances they are cool and collected.

"I had taken a train in this city for Philadelphia," said a Washington man, "and after an hour's stay in the smoker went into one of the regular passenger coaches. Casually looking over my fellow travelers, I happened to let my gaze rest on a demure, dainty little woman across the aisle from me, but whose seat was in alignment with mine. She was intently perusing the pages of a paper covered French novel. A little later she dropped the book and produced from her traps—she was surrounded by boxes, handbags and shawl strap bundles—a steamship schedule of the Campagnie General Transatlantique, the French line to Havre. To all appearances she was unconscious of the existence of her neighbors. She had removed her hat, a tasty toque, and was attired in a skirt, beneath which there peeped forth a trim little foot incased in a soft slipper.

"As we neared the Quaker City she became nervously animated. Laying aside her steamship schedule, she resurrected from some unseen hiding place a blouse of soft, rich material. She then tripped down the aisle to the ladies' lavatory, and a moment later returned with the silk garment, the blouse having taken its place. Resuming her seat, she buttoned the blouse with her deft fingers, fixed a gold brooch in place at her throat, and as quickly girded her petite figure with a leather belt.

"By this time I became interested in her movements and wondered what she would do next. I was not long left in the dark. With refreshing nonchalance she tossed over her head a street skirt of like fabric to the blouse. In some mysterious manner this was secured under the belt as the alpaca gown dropped to the floor. Then it was that every person in the car was watching her.

"I knew the next scene in the transformation act would be her most trying ordeal—the substitution of something more than substantial slippers. The circumscribed space between the seats of a day passenger coach is hardly the place one would select for such calisthenic exercise as I knew my fair fellow traveler was about to indulge in. Time, place and surroundings disturbed her not. A pair of stout walking boots were brought forth, the exchange soon made, and with the assistance of a silver buttonhook firmly fastened.

"During this operation her skirts were so carefully arranged about her ankles that not the smallest bit of hosiery was displayed, nor could a close observer, had one been present, get a glimpse of lingerie.

"The whole thing was so deftly done, so quickly accomplished, with grace and ease, while the principal performer was evidently ignorant of the contiguity of half a hundred amused people, that I could not help but admire the lovely little creature, so independent and self contained."—Washington Post.

A Scene In the Attorney General's Office.

Representative Wilson of West Virginia, whose distinguished position in the house entitles him to the utmost respect and consideration at the hands of any Democratic official, entered the office of the attorney general. The room was crowded with applicants for offices, and Mr. Olney was very much harrassed. Mr. Wilson stepped forward to the attorney general's desk. Mr. Olney turned savagely upon him.

"Sir," he said, "you have come up out of your turn. You are doing an injustice to those who have been waiting here, and you will have to go back to the foot of the line and await your turn."

Mr. Wilson, who is an exceedingly mild mannered gentleman, looked at the attorney general in amazement. He did not show his temper, however, but with chiding politeness inquired: "Did I hear you aright? Did you say I must go back and await my turn?"

"I did, sir," replied the attorney general.

"Very well, sir," said the West Virginian haughtily, "I shall go back, but I shall not return. When you desire to see me, you can send for me."

It was not until Mr. Wilson had departed that Attorney General Olney learned who it was that he had affronted.—Washington Cor. Cleveland Plain Dealer.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

Fact or Fiction About Two Great Fair Awards.

A newspaper paragraph denounces as "false" the claim of a baking powder company to an award at the World's Fair. Whom can it mean?

Certainly not Dr. Price's. Why? Because, as the records show, Dr. Price's exhibited, competed and received the highest award, both at Chicago and the California Midwinter Fair. The award in California included Gold Medal. The official examiners pronounced it the strongest, the purest, the most wholesome and efficient of all the baking powders. Its title to confidence is unquestioned.

Can it be the manufacturers of a New York powder, fictitiously labeled "absolutely pure" who are making "false" claims? That would be strange indeed, inasmuch as they were not even considered in the awards.

Was it Ammonia in the New York powder that prevented its makers from competing? If not, what?

DEATH'S BRIDAL.

By DAVID KER.

[Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.]

CHAPTER I.

SEEKING DEATH.

"His girl's likeness saved him when he meant to die."

The first day of Gettysburg was over. Northerner and southerner alike had fought their best, and the dead heaped along the slope of Cemetery hill showed that the contending hosts were worthy of each other. On the northern side every general engaged, save one, had had his horse killed under him. On the southern side General Rodes, riding up to rebuke an infantry battalion which he saw as he thought, lying down to escape the Yankee fire, found that they were all corpses fallen in their ranks.

All around the curving line of heights, on which a vast crescent of bright spots marked the northern position, another fiery crescent showed where Lee's men lay encamped in readiness for the morrow's battle, and a reckless fellow of Sickles' division posted to the left of Howard's position on Cemetery hill, said with a laugh, as he pointed to the far extending lights:

"The Johnnies air seein' a good few stars tonight, but I reckon we'll make 'em see some more tomorrow!"

"Guess they may make some of us see 'em, too, fore all's up," growled a veteran. "Them rebs kin fight some, so they kin!"

"Dry up, Pete," cried a third man, "you're a worse croaker than 'Never-die Joe' yonder. It's a mercy he's asleep, or we'd have him tellin' us who's to die tomorrow, and makin' us all feel bad."

And the speaker glanced at a man who lay sleeping beside the fire, with its fitful glare playing spectrally on his upturned face. Bronzed and weather worn as it was, that face was as delicate of outline as a woman's, and haunted all who saw it with a vague suggestion of one of the handsome, high bred, ill fated cavaliers of Charles I.

"He allers sleeps like that jist 'fore a fight," said one man in an awestricken whisper, "the only time he's happy is when he thinks he's gwine to die!"

"Darn my skin if I know what to make of him," added a second—a huge, heavy, good natured giant from Illinois. "He'd whip Old Nick himself at fightin'—he whipped me once, as you know, and taint every man kin do that; and he mout ha' been promoted a dozen times over if he'd liked. But no, not he! he allers says he wants nothin' but to die!"

"Well, it's rough on him if he can't find no kind Christian to obleege him in a leetle thing like that. When I'm a-gwine to die I don't mind changin' with him, or maybe the gineral 'ud hang him as a great favor if he was to beg hard."

"He's a queer sort, that's a fact. He looks like a gal and talks as soft as a child, but in battle, by thunder, he's"——

"Like the divil wid a toothache!" broke in a deep Irish voice.

"Hello, Mike, are you there! Say, boys, do you remember how Mike said t'other night that he didn't fear man or devil, and jist then an old cow poked its horns over the fence and went 'Moo-oo-oo!' and down goes Mike on his knees and sings out, 'Forgive me, Misther Satan, I didn't mane you!'"

"Och, be aisy, ye vagabone!" retorted Mike O'Reilly. "Sure, when I hit yez from behind wid a hot pratie, didn't ye scrame out: 'Lord have mercy on my sowl! I'm shot!'"

Amid the silence that followed the laugh which ensued, the slumbering man by the fire, speaking in his sleep, was heard to say in cold and haughty tones:

"Apparently your royal highness does not remember me."

And then, with a struggle and a violent start, the sleeper awoke.

"Sure, is it the Prince ov Wales he's talkin to?" cried Mike, staring. "'Twas royal highness' he said annyhow. Who is he, thin, at all, at all?"

But the mysterious Joe, without seeming even to hear him, rose and went straight up to the big Illinoisan and held out his hand.

"Dick," said he, with an unconscious dignity that impressed even the rude fellow to whom he spoke, "we had a fair fight, and I hope you bear me no grudge for it, as I'm sure I bear you none. Shake hands, and let us be friends tonight, for tomorrow one of us two must die!"

"You didn't happen to hear which one, Joe?" faltered the giant, who evidently put full faith in his comrade's strange prophecy, as indeed did all the rest, judging by their looks of awe.

"No," said the other wearily, "but I know which I wish it may be."

Somehow the talk and laughter flagged after that, and the group melted away in silence.

It was five o'clock in the evening of the following day. The July sun loomed dimly through a vast cloud of smoke, and the air shook with the deep unslackening roar of two hundred southern guns, mingled with the ceaseless crash of the boughs torn by the pelting shot from the trees along the Yankee line. The second of the three great Confederate assaults was at hand, and Sickles and his gallant few, in their advanced position, were about to bear the brunt of it.

Foremost among his comrades stood "Never-die Joe," calm and silent as ever, but with the light of a strange and terrible joy in his deep gray eyes. Only amid the storm of battle and the shadow of doom could that restless spirit—ever seeking death with an ardor the secret of which no man knew—hope to find peace, and such a storm was about to burst upon him now as even he had never witnessed yet.

Suddenly the cannonade ceases, and then the air rings with the ear piercing yell of the southern war cry, and the northern soldiers see dimly through the rolling smoke a huge dark gray wave, crested with a glittering spray of bayonets, come surging up the slope straight toward their lines.

And now the Federal artillery speaks out in its turn, and the sharp crackle of small arms mingles with the thunder of the cannon. Men fall at every step in the ranks of the charging column, and down goes Hood himself, struck by a bullet; but the rush of Longstreet's men comes on unchecked, and bursts into the foremost battery like a waterfall.

And, after that, all is like the whirl of a troubled dream. A wild vision of fierce faces and tossing arms, half seen through billowy smoke—a furious clamor of mingled cries—a hot, stifling reek of dust and gunpowder—a wild beast longing to tear and kill, tingling to the very finger tips of every man in the melee.

The guns are taken—the defenders are driven back—and then comes a desperate rally, and the figure of "Never-die Joe" is seen for a moment in the forefront of the fight, whirling his clubbed rifle round his head like a flail, and striking right and left with the strength of a giant. Then the pall of smoke closes round him, and he is seen no more.

The men in gray press on—the men in blue, stubbornly contesting every foot of ground, are forced back step by step—when all at once a deep voiced shout peals forth from the rear, and the dashing Hancock and his men come up at a run to restore the fight. There is a flash of leaping flame through the smoke, like lightning playing in a cloud—a fierce, short spasm of hand-to-hand battle—a swaying to and fro of struggling masses of bluecoats and graycoats, like conflicting waves—and then the tide of assault wavers, rolls back and ebbs sullenly away.

"As sure as my name's Bill Slocum," said one of two men who were going over the battle field with lanterns a few hours later, "we'll find him alive yet. Don't ye remember how, at Chancellorsville, he was the only man left out of a hull comp'ny? Seems to me, Mike, as Death's someways like a woman: when you run arter him he fights shy and slides off, but the minute you begin to look as if you didn't care for his comp'ny, up he comes right away!"

"It's I that 'ud be glad to belave that same," growled O'Reilly, "but didn't I see him fall wid my own two eyes?"

"What of it?" said Bill consolingly. "I guess he was only wounded, anyhow. You mustn't call any man dead, Mick, till he's bin returned as sitch on the ficial list o' killed and wounded."

"Troth, it's aisy to talk," rejoined Mike ruefully, "but hasn't many a dacent bhoy thought himself only wounded whin he was dead all the time?"

Bill's broad laugh at this splendid "bull" was suddenly checked by the sight of Illinois Dick's mighty form lying lifeless, with upturned face, upon a heap of dead.

"Joe's bin a true prophet, I reckon. He said either he or poor old Dick was bound to die. Well, if Dick's dead, Joe must be alive, and I guess he ain't far off, neither, for it was jist somewheres round here as I seed him last. Hello! here's one reb livin' yet, anyway. How do, Johnny? How d'ye feel?"

"Kind o' shaky, I reckon," said the southerner, with a faint laugh.

"Thry a dhrop o' this, me bhoy," cried Mike, offering his canteen, "it'll do yez more good than anny medicine, bad luck to that same dirty stuff! Troth, 'twas an illigant lick ye got," added he, eying admiringly a fearful gash on the fallen man's head—"purty enough for ould Donnybrook, anny day!"

"That's so," said the Confederate, seemingly revived by his draught. "The last lick he giv' wur the one I got, and I don't want to order no more at the same store, I tell yer! He wur a tall Yank, with a smooth face that looked like a putty gal, and fit like forty wildcats!"

"By thunder! that must ha' bin Joe hisself!" cried Bill eagerly. "Say, Johnny, what becomed of him, annyway?"

"Dead, I reckon—and lucky for us, too, else he'd ha' laid out our hull battalion single handed. We hollered to him to surrender when he wur left all alone right in among us all, but it warn't a mite o' use. He jist clinched his teeth and kept hammerin' away with his clubbed piece, same as if he wur thrashin' corn, till at last Tom Wiley hed to shoot him jist to be done with it.'

"And here he is," cried Slocum, whose keen eye had been scanning the surrounding corpses while the man was speaking. "Hello! what's this? Great Scott! his hand's warm!"

"Warm, is it? Hurroo!" shouted O'Reilly, with a true Tipperary yell. "He's alive, thin—divil a less! Hurroo!"

"Steady, Mick," said his cooler comrade; "we want to handle him carefully, you know, if he's badly hit. Hello! is the feller's skin bullet proof? Here's a ball in his clothes as flat as a buckwheat cake! Show a light, Mick."

O'Reilly held up the lantern, and the marvel was at once explained.

Hidden in the breast of the soldier's shirt was a flat metal case, which had stopped the ball that would otherwise have reached his heart. As Bill touched it it came open in his hand, disclosing the sunny hair and sweet, pure face of a beautiful American girl.

"Think o' that, now!" muttered Bill Slocum with an unwonted softness in his deep, hoarse tones. "His girl's likeness saved him when he meant to die! Jist let me catch any feller sayin' there ain't no God arter that!"

And Mike O'Reilly, with the instinctive chivalry of his warm hearted Irish nature, put the miniature gently back in its place and drew the unconscious man's bullet torn clothing carefully over it, saying simply:

"'Twas himself that thried to kape it hid, and he must niver know that anny one saw it."

The Trolley Buzz.

Just as constant use of the telephone was said to produce aural affection popularly known as "telephone ear," so is the overhead wire system of electric transit being held responsible for an affliction which in Philadelphia is denominated "the trolley buzz." It is a nervous affliction resulting from the combination of hiss and roar which is a prominent feature of the "cheap and nasty" system of rapid transit. It worries the possessors of fine sensibilities, is dangerously annoying to the sick and prevents the robust from sleeping as they ought to sleep. "Have you got the trolley buzz?" is a common query in the Quaker City, and if greedy corporations can have their way here the same inquiry will take the place of the oriental "How is your liver?" or the American "How d'ye do?"

A HOUSE IN A FRET.

Let the mother become sick and helpless, and the house is all in disorder. When both father and mother are down, you may as well close the shutters. Order is brought out of chaos often very easily, and Mrs. John Malin, of South Butte, Mont., Feb. 17, 1893, found an easy way out of her difficulties, as she writes thus: "My husband and I took very bad rheumatism from severe colds, and my arms were so lame I could not raise them to help myself. I sent at once for a bottle of St. Jacobs Oil, and before the bottle was half empty I could go about my work. My husband became so lame he could not get out of bed. Two and a half bottles completely cured him. I will always praise St. Jacobs Oil, and you may use this as you see fit." This is a clear case of what is best at the right moment, and how every household can be made happy where pain abounds.

HAVE NO EQUAL.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS have attained a world-wide reputation solely upon their superative merits. They have many would-be rivals, but have never been equalled or even approached in curative properties and rapidity and safety of action. Their value has been attested by the highest medical authorities, as well as by unimpeachable testimonials from those who have used them, and they are recommended as the best external remedy for weak back, rheumatism, sciatica, colds, coughs, sore throat, chest and stomach affections, kidney difficulties, weak muscles, strains, stitches, and aches and pains of every description.

Do not be deceived by misrepresentation. Ask for and insist upon having ALLCOCK'S. BRANDRETH'S PILLS assist nature.

BEFORE A FULL HEAD OF STEAM

Is gathered by that tremendously destructive engine, nine out of ten, put on the brakes with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which will check its progress and avert disaster. Chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague and ague cake are promptly relieved and ultimately cured by this genial specific, which is also a comprehensive family medicine, speedily useful in cases of dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation, sick headache, nervousness, rheumatism and neuralgia. Against the hurtful effects of sudden changes of temperature, exposure in wet weather, there is no application to laborious mental pursuits, and other influences prejudicial to health, it is a most trustworthy safeguard. It fortifies the system against disease, promotes appetite and sleep, and hastens convalescence after debilitating and flesh-wasting diseases.

From the way some men offer prayers it is difficult to tell whether they are ministers or auctioneers.

CATARRH CANNOT BE CURED

With local applications, as they cannot reach the seat of the disease. Catarrh is a blood or constitutional disease, and in order to cure it you must take internal remedies. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, and acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces. Hall's Catarrh Cure is not a quack medicine. It was prescribed by one of the best physicians in this country for years, and is a regular prescription. Helpless Ten Weeks

"I was attacked with acute rheumatism and was laid up in the house ten weeks. My right arm was withered away to skin and bone, and I had almost lost the use of it. A friend advised me to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, which I did, and by the time the first bottle was used I was feeling a little better. I could see and feel a great change. The flesh was returning to my arm, and the soreness was leaving my body and limbs. Every spring and fall since we have used three to six bottles in our family. I find to use Hood's Sarsaparilla is cheaper than to pay doctors' bills. I am thankful that I have found a medicine which will help a man who has rheumatism. It keeps me in good health."—RICHARD FORRESTALL, Oelwein, Iowa.

Crooked Ways in Which Money is Made.

WHY THE CASH WOULDN'T BALANCE

Mysterious Disappearance by the Ledger-demain of Rascally Ingenu ty—Money Made on "Returned Goods."

There is quite a large portion of the human family who "get their living by their wits," that is, they get by rascality and low cunning what they cannot or will not obtain by honest means. In many cases the disposition to commit these crimes seems to be a manifestation of natural depravity, while in too many other cases it ariess from a lack of correct early training. The boy who, by virtue of a practical business education, is qualified to fill a good, paying position, does not feel the force of temptation to dishonesty that assails an uneducated drudge, who has nothing to look forward to but subordinate positions and poor pay.

A writer in the New York "Sun" gives an interesting account of the doings of some of the crooked gentry which we quote:

I happened into the office of a large factory one day to see a friend, and during the call I met the proprietor and asked him how business was.

"I'm about discouraged," he replied.

"But you seem to be very busy filling orders."

"So I am, but for some reason I can't make any money. It seems as if the more we did the less profit we made." On the desk before him was a bill he had marked "O. K." It was for stuff purchased—lumber, paint and oil.

Without meaning to do so I glanced at the items, and footed up the column of figures. It stood as follows:

6 kegs paint, at $1.80 each	$10 80
10 gals. oil, at 63 cents per gallon	6 30
Lumber from Nell's	18 00
Hauling same	1 75
Hoop iron	3 80
Paint brushes	4 20
Total	$3 25

The bill was in the handwriting of the man who acted as bookkeeper, cashier and buyer for the factory, and was six bills put together to save separate O. K.'s. Does the reader see anything wrong with the figures? I did at a glance. The total should have been forty-four dollars and eighty-five cents instead of fifty-three dollars and twenty-five cents.

"Where is your bookkdeeper this afternoon?" I asked.

"He's out."

"Well, find me all the bills you can." He brought me half a dozen from the hook, and we discovered that each one had been falsified in adding up the figures. Next day the man was sent away on an errand and an expert brought in to overhaul his books, and in half a day over four thousand dollars in small embezzlements could be footed up. He had taken the simplest way to rob his employer, and one which is always practiced with the most success.

A similar discovery was brought about in a sitll more singular manner. I was riding along the highway when I noticed a folded paper which had evidently fallen from some ones' pocket. When I alighted and picked it up, I found it to be the weekly pay roll of a brick and tile yard. The owner of the yard, while a very successful business man, as a poor scholar, and he employed a young man to keep his books and handle more or less cash. The pay roll stood as follows:

Adams	$13 00
Arms	11 83
Benson	10 00
Carter	10 05
Davis	10 50
Evarts	12 15
Fick	12 00
Gorman	9 20
Hanson	8 35
Total	$112 68

The laborers were working at piece work, and each one's credit differed from another's. I ran the column of figures up and found an error. I tried it again, and was satisfied that the true total was only $98.88. I took the paper to the brick man, learned who had made out the roll, and within an hour had got hold of evidence to prove that in one year his young man had defrauded him of $890 by means of false footings.

For several years I was detailed on a branch of detective work known as "mysterious thefts," and many of them did really have a mysterious appearance at the outset. One of my very first cases was that of loss of money in a retail store. A girl eighteen years of age acted as cashier, and she had an office in the rear of the store. This office was railed in to a height of seven or eight feet, and had two cash windows. The cashier occupied it exclusively, and it had come about on several occasions that her cash wouldn't balance the tips on the hook. She would be short $2, $5, $10 or $20, and there must be something wrong somewhere. As she had to make the shortage good, she could not be suspected, and, indeed, it was on her demand that I was sent for to investigate the case. I took hold, thinking it would be a tough one, but luck aided me to speedily solve the mystery. No one on the floor of the store could take the money, as no one was admitted to the office, and the bills were stacked up on the counter next to the wall, a clear twelve feet from either of the cash windows.

I entered the store at half-past eleven o'clock in the forenoon. At twelve half of the employees went out to dinner, and three or four others lunched from their baskets. Among the latter was the cashier. She sat on a stool facing the front of the store with her back to the money, and kept up a conversation with a girl seated just outside the railing. She had been seated thus about ten minutes when I saw a string slowly descend from the floor above her head. It came down alongside the wall, and the little black ball at the end of it rested for a moment on the top bill of the pile of bank notes. Then it was drawn up, and away went a bill with it, and was drawn through a hole above. The cashier neither saw nor heard. The few employees of the store were busy, and festoons of dress goods, handkerchiefs, etc., from pillar to pillar, obstructed their vision. I went softly up-stairs and found a stock boy eating his dinner just over the office. I stood him up and found a $10 bill in his vest pocket, with a fresh spot of pitch on it, and his fish-line was concealed under a box near by. There was a hole in the floor where some heavy box had smashed a board. He owned right up, and the mystery was a mystery no longer. He had never taken but one bill at a time, and that always when the cashier was eating.

Men have always been obliged to trust other men, and they always will be, and when an employer has once satisfied himself that a certain employee is all right, it is the hardest kind of work to convince him that there is anything wrong. This loyalty is all right in one sense, but it has shielded many criminals. Were every employee to be continually under espionage or suspicion it would be a sad state of affairs. The senior partner of an old dry goods house once called me to his office to report a leakage which the house had vainly endeavored to stop. The shortage was not in the cash, but in the stock. Men had been set to watch for shoplifters, but non of that class had been spotted. All employees had been watched, but no one had been caught taking goods away. Most of the salesmen had been with the house for years, and the floor-walker longest of all. Suspicion pointed to no one, and yet it was certain that a leak existed. Aided by my usual luck, I was only three or four days in discovering it.

The store had a fine, high-class trade, and many articles were sent on approval. In lounging about I saw articles brought back and handed to the floor-walker to be returned to the office as "returned." It occurred to me that there might be two sides to this system, and it wasn't two hours before a lady came in and said to him:

"I came to pay $20 for the cloak sent up on Tuesday on approval."

He took her name and money and went back to the office and reported the cloak as returned, and pocketed the money. I got three cases on him before making my report, and when I did report to the senior partner he flew out and declared that it looked like a put-up job to earn my money. It was easy enough to satisfy him, however, as I had kept the addresses of the different buyers. A call at each address brought forth the declaration that the goods had been paid for, but we waited for a fourth case and then caught the man in a box. He was wound up so tightly that he made a full confession and begged for mercy. He had taken over $6,000 in this way, and had been playing the game for years, and was the last man in the store who would have been suspected.

John Gilman, insurance agent in a city of 25,000 inhabitants, had a mystery which he called me in to solve. He had an office on the ground floor of a building at the corner of Main and Walnut streets, but fronting on Main and running back to Walnut. On Walnut, adjoining him, was a tobacco store. His safe stood in a recess at the back of the store, and this recess was just two feet wider than the safe. It was wainscoted up to the height of the safe. Now, Gilman had been mising money right along for two or three months, and the mystery was that it had been in each instance taken out of his safe. He alone knew the combination, and in every case it had been opened in the regular way. I found it hard to credit his statements. No one had broken into the office; no one, as far as he could see, had touched the safe, and yet he was sure the money had been taken.

For instance, he had placed $200 in it at night, and next morning $30 was missing. Out of $100, $15 had been taken. Out of a package of $300 drawn from the bank and carefully recounted $35 had been taken. To make sure that the fault was not his he had kept a memorandum. He had, for instance, written down "$250 over three times. There are 10 $20 bills." That money had been put into the safe at night, and next morning it was short $20. Gilman had no occasion to rob himself, nor was he a somnamublist, and it puzzled me not a little how to go to work. One afternoon I asked him to lock and unlock the safe in my presence. It was a combination of four letters, and as he worked it he called out to himself: "J-a-n-e, Jane." This was the name of his wife.

With that as a starter I began to investigate the tobacco store. I found that the clerk, who was a young man of twenty, slept there nights. I got a chance to look at the wall opposite Gilman's safe, and I found it wainscoted up as on the other side, and right here was the bookkeeper's desk. Everything appeared regular, but that night I remained in the office after the agent went home. The office was dark, and I took a seat within three feet of the safe. At about eleven o'clock I heard a slight noise in the recess, and next moment a part of the wainscoting was lifted out, some one crawled through from the tobacco store, and presently the intruder sat down before the safe, opened the slide of a dark lantern just a bit, and opened the door as quickly as Gilman could have done it. He took out a roll of bills containing $230, counted them over, and then returned all but $20. When he had closed the door I heard him say: "J-a-n-e, Jane." I then nabbed him, and he proved to be the clerk in the tobacco store. He had played a pretty sharp game. There was a loose knot in one of the boards, and one evening in moving a box he had jared this out. He had applied mucilage to the knot, and was restoring it to place when he heard Gilman locking the safe, and also heard him pronounce the combination. This gave him an idea. Procuring a fine saw he cut a panel out of the wainscoting large enough to enable him to crawl through, and after that he made two or three raids per week. His scheme to take only a small portion of any sum he found was a good one, but luck and accident helped me to get the best of him.

ONLY A SCRATCH NEEDED.

The Frequency of Blood Poisoning Among the Meat Packers.

"It would surprise you to know," recently remarked an officer of one of our large packing houses, "how frequent cases of blood poisoning are among our employees, and the cause in most of these instances would doubtless surprise you more. A scratch on the hand from a bone of a calf's head or a pig's foot often disables a man for a week, and, strangely enough, in almost every case that has come under my notice the scratch has been so slight as to be almost imperceptible.

"The first intimation the man has of his injury is a swelling of the forearm, accompanied by a smarting pain. Both swelling and pain generally extend to the shoulder, under which a large lung sometimes forms. Even after the presence of the scratch has been in this manner demonstrated it is often impossible to detect it. It is usually caused, in the case of the calf's head, by the sharp edge on the bone of the neck, due to the carelessness of the butcher who severs the head from the carcass. If he does his work well and his cleaver has severed the joint perfectly, all is well, for there is no sharp edge to cut, but if he has missed the joint by even a hair's breadth, which happens in five cases out of ten, there is an edge on the bone that will probably work mischief.

"Of course none of these cases has ever resulted seriously, as prompt measures are always taken and as we always insist that a man so injured immediately consult a physician. This rule we never vary, for we feel bound to retain a man on the pay roll while suffering from such an accident, even though he be unfitted for work, and the unskillful treatment of an apothecary, on which many of them would like to rely, or the even less satisfactory methods of home surgery would only prolong the term of idleness."—New York Sun.

COINS OF LITTLE PRACTICAL USE.

The Gold Dollar Had No Utility, While the Three Cent Piece Served a Purpose.

To one who has not given the subject thought it would seem that the most useless coins ever issued by the United States were the silver 3 cent pieces. They were small, as thin as a sheet of manilla paper, and before they finally disappeared from circulation they came to be regarded as nuisances.

Although there is much to be said against the annoying little coins, they were, as a matter of fact, of far greater utility, as far as circulation is concerned, than another coin. This is the gold dollar, which, experts at the subtreasury say, has never served any useful purpose. Said Maurice Muhleman, cashier of the subtreasury, recently:

"From the mutilated condition of the gold dollars sent here for redemption it is positively shown that the public do not regard them as coins. Their only use appears to be for bangles, necklaces, watch charms, scarfpins and the like. It is doubtful if one in a thousand ever really passed in circulation.

"With the 3 cent silver piece it was different. When first coined, the country had nothing in the shape of a coin between the huge copper cents and half cents and the silver half dime. The small coin was hailed as a blessing and became popular at once. There was an excellent reason for its issue also.

"Strange as it may seem, it was not provided for by a coinage act, but by an act revising the postal rates. This law lowered the cost for transmitting the unit of weight for letters from 5 to 3 cents. It was deemed advisable by congress thereupon to issue a coin of corresponding denomination. The coin was of great utility and circulated freely until the advent of the nickel."—New York Herald.

"The Girl I Left Behind Me."

The fame of the song "The Girl I Left Behind Me" is worldwide. No British man-of-war leaves harbor, no British regiment leaves its station for foreign service, without the plaintive air being heard by the men who are leaving and the girls—their mothers, sisters, wives and sweethearts—who are being left behind. This song, like many another that has stirred the British heart at home and abroad, that has given valor in the fight and brought the soft recollections of the motherland amid the horrors of the battlefield, is anonymous.

It is no doubt of Irish origin, but no one can tell who wrote either the words or the music. It has been found in a manuscript dated about 1770. "The air was also taken down," says Bunting, "from A. O'Neil, harper, A. D. 1800, author and date unknown. The air was written for a march, and the English version of the words, called 'Brighton Camp,' differs considerably from these." Chappell, while he put in an English claim to the air, admits that it may be Irish. He thinks it was probably written in 1758, when there were encampments along the coast—at Brighton among the rest—where many tunes of this sort originated. Wherever it was first played, it is now almost a century since it became the soldier's and sailor's loath-to-leave, and it has so long been played on every man-of-war as she weighed anchor and for every regiment as it quitted a town where it had been stationed that an omission would be thought a slight upon the ladies.

INSECT MIMICS.

Quaint Disguises Assumed by the Animal Kingdom.

TAKE ON THE SHAPES OF LEAVES.

Gigantic "Walking Sticks" a Foot Long. Spiders Which Swing Themselves Into Invisibility.

In wandering through one of the picturesque canyons of the Sierra Madre Mountains one day I noticed coming down through the air with a peculiar motion a green leaf. It zigzagged from side to side, and finally landed in a bush near at hand. Wondering merely why such a leaf would fall from a spruce tree, I would have passed on, had not my dog, with more prescience, stopped and nosed the leaf, telling me, after his fashion, to look.

This I did, and found this green object that had come scurrying down was not a leaf at all, but a great green katydid with gauze-like wings, protected by covers that were so exact in their imitation of other leaves in general that any one would have been deceived.

The insect was a natural mimic, and even its flight downward from the tree was a protective one, calculated to deceive any feathered enemy that might have been in the vicinity.

In all life there is a certain adaptation to its peculiar surroundings. Gaily-tinted birds are not, as a rule, found on white sandy wastes, but in forests where there is deep coloring and the contrast is not great. The tawny lion, the giraffe, the ostrich, are forms which assimilate their surroundings. In California the horned toad is almost as invisible as the sand in which it lives. A little canyon toad mimics the rocks upon which it rests, in color, while the frogs of the East are hardly distinguishable from the green reeds among which they hide.

This peculiar method of defense is particularly marked among insects. Some years ago a traveling fakir stopped at a bungalow in India and offered for a small sum to show the guests of the sahib, who were new in India, a miracle. Told to go ahead, he produced a small tree with leaves about three inches long, which he thurst into the ground, then took from a large box carried by an attendant a dozen butterflies of great beauty. After the guests had examined them and assured themselves that the insects were alive, the fakir tossed them one by one into the air. Each alighted on the tree and became invisible. When all had disappeared the fakir asked the sahib to look for them. The Englishman examined the tree carefully, but failed to find the dozen butterflies, each of which was four inches across.

They had all heard of the Indian hypnotism, and thought that this possibly was an instance in kind; but the laughing fakir caught up the tree and giving it a shake the insects floated in the air for a moment, and gathered about the tree again to mysteriously disappear.

The fakir then pointed out the illusion; the butterflies were not a foot from their eyes, and so mimicked the leaves when their wings were folded that the deception was perfect, both in color and shape. There were even the delicate mold spots, the central or midrib of the leaf and the delicate lateral branches from it, while the stem of the leaf was closely imitated by the lower portion of the wings which were pressed against the stem.

This mimic, known to science as kallina, if followed by a bird simply alights on a bush or tree and becomes invisible and the fakir has simply taken advantage of the natural protection of the butterfly.

The same portection is seen in many common butterflies that mimic flowers or leaves. Remarkable resemblances are noticed among the moths, some mimicking bits of wood or stone, so that when they alight they become at once invisible, and thus escape from any possible pursuer.

Some interesting instances of mimicry are found in India. A naturalist noted a butterfly here that was not only a remarkable mimic, but when followed it imitated the peculiar flight of a poisonous butterfly that was obnoxious to the birds.

In almost every group of insects is found this protective resemblance, and those among the walking-sticks and walking leaves are the most wonderful.

While the Phyllium resembles a leaf, the Phasmida is a mimic of a twig or branch. The long straight body is a perfect stick, the legs resembling twigs branching from it, and when walking they move in so deliberate a manner that even then the illusion is not destroyed.

A South American walking-stick is a veritable giant, almost a foot in length. These are green, resembling young shoots, and are found among green verdure; but one observed by Bolt, the English naturalist, was a perfect mimic of a dead twig, and had upon its sides and legs curious excresences that mimicked fungous growths, so that the bird who had seen it moving would consider it nothing but a dried twig.

The curious insect known as the mantis are remarkable for their powers of mimicry. Their movements are slow; their bodies and legs resemble twigs, and they are by this disguise enabled to creep upon their prey. One species has been known to seize and eat small birds, who, thinking it a bit of the branch, so fall into its clutches. Perhaps the most remarkable mimic among the insects is a pink mantis of India, that is almost exact in its resemblance to an orchid. The object here is evidently to capture insects that alight on it by mistake.

Many insects protect their eggs or young by unconscious mimicry. Many of the spiders are mimics. The most extraordinary attempt at defense it was ever my good fortune to observe on the part of a spider, was one in which the insect not only disguised but rendered itself completely invisible. I was wandering through the bog cedar bush of one of the Florida keys, sixty miles from Cuba, when I came upon a huge web that completely barred the way; the long cables extended as braces in every direction, while in the center poised a big yellow spider.

The moment it caught sight of me it began to swing the web, first slowly then more rapidly, until in a short time the spider had disappeared from view, although not a foot from my eyes; it was simply vibrating in its web, but so rapidly that my eyes could not follow it. In a few moments the motions gradually ceased, and, as I remained perfectly quiet, the spider assumed its normal position, beginning the swinging when I touched the web. Such a device would completely deceive a bird.

I may not inaptly refer to the mimicry of the crabs, which, with the insects, constitute a great branch of the animal kingdom, and are, popularly speaking, the insects of the sea. It is equally as essential that they should be protected from the various predatory fishes, and in almost every instance they resemble to some extent their surroundings, and in several instances deliberately disguise themselves. On the coral keys of the tropics I have seen crabs come out of their dens of sand and eye me as I lay there watching them; but these spectral fellows were almost invisible even a few feet away, so white were they, almost perfectly mimicking the sand in their absence of color.

Not fifty feet away, where the shore line ended, and the sand was covered with a yellowish green matting of dead leaves of bay cedar, lived another crab, Geccarcinus, a sturdy fellow that climbed the cactus, and it was a brilliant purple with greenish tints on its legs, and so perfectly secure amid its surroundings that I was almost bitten by one, mistaking it for the purple fruit of the prickly pear, on a leaf of which it hung. The so-called stone crabs mimic their surroundings and can hardly be distinguished; and the box crab, which folds its legs beneath its shell, shutting up like a turtle, would be passed by the hungriest fish.

The most interesting mimics I have seen in crab life are those which live in the sargassum or gulfweed. I have spent hours in drifting with these bits of the sargassum sea, on the edge of the Gulf Stream where it flows from the tropics, and here there is a special pelagic fauna all of which are mimics. It it almost impossible to distinguish the crabs even when looking at them closely, as upon their backs are reflected the exact tints of the weed—a remarkable phase in the struggle for existence.—Charles Frederick Holder, in Mail and Express.

THE HASTY WORD.

To think before you speak is so wise an axiom that one would hardly think it needful to emphasize it by repetition. And yet in how many cases the hasty temper flashes out in the hasty word, and the latter does its work with the precision and pain of the swift stiletto. Singularly enough, the hasty word oftenest wounds those who love one another dearly, and the very closeness of their intimacy affords them opportunity for the sudden thrust.

We know the weak points in the armor of our kinsman and our friend; we are aware of his caprices, and originally are tender and compassionate even of his vanities and whims; but there dawns a day when it is written in the book of fate that we shall be as cruel as we are loving. We are cold, or tired, or hungry. We are anxious over unpaid bills, or our expected letters have not arrived, or one of the children is ailing, and we dread the outcome of the malady. So politeness fail us, fortitude is vanquished, philosophy is in abeyance, and we say that which we repent in sackcloth and ashes.

But though the hasty word may be forgiven, it is not at once forgotten. It has flawed the crystal of our friendship; the place may be cemented, but there is a shadowy scar on the gleaming surface. Oh, if the word of haste had but been left unspoken; if the strong hand of patience had but held back the sword as if to strike!—Harper's Bazaar.

WHAT A COMMA CAN DO.

An English educational journal relates this story, which carries its own application:

A Prussian school inspector appeared in the office of the burgomaster of a little town for the purpose of asking him to accompany him on a tour of inspection through the schools. The burgomaster, rather out of sorts, muttered, "Does this donkey come again?" The inspector waited his time for a proper answer, according to the immortal advice, "Vengeance is a dish that must be eaten cool." When the inspector was introduced to the teacher, he said he was curious to see how well punctuation was taught. The burgomaster, the local supervisory authority, said: "Never mind that; we care naught for commas and the like." But the inspector ordered a boy to go to the board and write: "The burgomaster of R. says, the inspector is a donkey." hen The ordered him to change the comma by placing it after R and inserting one after inspector. Thus: "The burgomaster of R., says the inspector, is a donkey." It was a cruel lesson, but it is reasonable to suppose that commas rose in the estimation of the "local supervisory authority."

China's foreign trade amounts to about $238,000,000 a year, of which 60 per cent. is with Great Britain.

KNIVES IN VARIETY.

Interesting Collections in the Museum, Washington.

FATHER OF MODERN POCKETKNIVES.

The Pre-historic Examples Fashioned from Slips of Flint—Many Rare and Curious Blades.

Show me the man who does not recall that tingling sensation of delight which ran through his youthful anatomy when he was presented with his first pocket knife.

I do. The knife was of the dog-handle variety. It wasn't much to cut with, but as a blister raiser it was a howling success. I think they are seldom seen now outside of little notion shops and country stores. It was all cast iron.

The handle was fashioned in the likeness of a dog with outstretched legs, and was painted a beautiful green, with red polka dots. I think it must have been invented by some old bachelor for the punishment of little boys. It was an instrument of torture to the youthful carver, full of uneven lumps and jagged edges. The more you tried to cut into it the more the dog's hind legs dug into your hand, until the offending canine had to be sewed up in a picee of cloth to ease the pain—yours, not the dog's, says the Washington "Star."

After the dog knife came the Barlow, the one we used to make boats with, out of cigar box lids, to sail in the gatter. The handle half bone and half steel, with one big, sturdy blade. It was the father of the modern pocketknife.

Uncle Sam, who is a famous whittler, has a fine collection of jackknives in the National Musem. They are arranged in little black pasteboard boxes, and were gathered from all over the world. The first jackknife was a stone chip. Those in the museum are made of calcareous flint.

They were found in England, in the eastern and southern portions, from Norfolk to Lands' End. There are also several from the caves of France.

The chipped stone blade belonged to the paleolithic or old stone age, and the polished blade to the neolithic or new stone age. You can get an idea of the antiquity of the chipped blade when you remember that the animals of that period were extinct before our earliest knowledge of natural history, and the climate of France was probably no warmer than the arctic regions to-day.

The first metal blades were those of the bronze age. The two specimens in the museum are from the lake dwellings of Switzerland. The bronze was composed of tin and copper and was partially brought from Asia. Fifty-seven foundries for the casting of bronze implements have been found in France and a number in Italy, the one at Bologna having no less than 14,000 pieces broken and ready for recasting. The bronze workers were descendants of the neolithic age, their blades being similar in shape to the stone implements of that period.

The chipped stone jackknife is made and used in our country to-day. While you are reading the "Star" which represents all of the most wonderful modern inventions, the telegraph, the telephone, typewriter, phonograph, and the type-setting machine, the Hupa Indians of the Northern California are cutting wood with stone knives and catching fish with shell and stone hooks.

The Hupa is an expert stone worker. He takes a piece of jasper or obsidian (volcanic glass) and heats it in the fire. In cooling, it breaks into chips. He takes one of the most promising chips in his left hand, after having first put on a rough skin glove for protection against the sharp stone. With a pair of picners made of buckhorn, tied together at the point with a thong, he proceeds to chip off little flakes or scales, turning and twisting the stone until it is fashioned in the proper shape.

The Tlingit and Halda Indians of Alaska are great carvers, and do wonderful work with their home-made jackknives. Their stone knife, or adz, is often hafted to a branch of a tree. They use sharp fish bones and rough fish skin for finishing and sandpapering their wood carvings.

When iron was introduced by the Russians the natives were not slow to adapt it to their purposes. They made steel knives with long, thin blades that could be bent and twisted into a variety of shapes, and were as useful as a whole kit of tools.

The jackknives of the Eskimo are various. Some are made of slate rubbed down and polished to a sharp cutting edge and set in wooden or bone handles. They are very clumsy, with thick wooden sheaths, into which they are lashed and tied with sealskin thongs when not in use. Next to one of these knives in the collection is another Eskimo blade, as pretty in its way as any ladys' pearl-handled pocket knife, and it is only about two and a-half inches long, blade and all.

The blade is of steel, and gently tapering, set into an ivory handle. It is riveted in place, and, like all primitive knives, does not open or shut. Most of the Eskimo knives used in carving are made with steel blades, riveted to ivory or bone handles, and some of the handles are notched to fit the grip of the fingers.

In the museum collection is the finest knife of its kind in the world. The blade is of a beautiful pale green jade or pectolite, about eight inches long. Leaf-shaped and polished to the smoothness of steel, it tapers down to a very business-like point. It is thick in the center and is two-edged, like the old Roman dagger. The jade from which it was made is found round Kotzibu Sound.

The Eskimo's favorite jackknife is the file. They date the commencement of their finest ivory carvings from its introduction by the Russians. The handle end they grind to a blade, using the angles for grooving and the flat faces for smoothing.

Uncle Sam has one of his own jackknives in his collection. It is the one which has replaced the old clasp knife, or frog sticker, formerly carried by his jolly tars. The sailor, you know, carries his knife attached to the white cord or lanyard, round his neck and stuck down in the tight band of his trousers. The old knife was an awkward thing to use in nasty weather, when the wind was howling aloft, and often much valuable time was lost in getting the blade open when a rope had to be spliced or a frozen knot cut.

Very often Jack had to hang on with one hand and open the knife with his teeth. Another objection to the old knife was the ease with which it could be and often was changed from a useful instrument into a weapon of defense or offense.

The new knife is arranged with a hollow handle, into which the blade slips by pressing a spring in the back. It does not open like an ordinary knife, but by pressing the blade runs out of its own weight. It is cut off square at the point, so that Jack is less liable to injure his fellow during any little misunderstanding which might occur, for the spring which releases the blade also allows it to run up in the handle when pressed upon, and as it is placed just where the hand is sure to grip it during a jackknife argument it would be almost sure to run into the handle rather than anything else.

An ugly looking knife is "el curvo" of Chili. It is carried by all the natives, and is used for carving beef and cutting throats. It looks like a pruning knife. The blade is heavy and has a murderous-looking hook at the end.

Next to "el curvo" is a Japanese knife, with a long, polished blade set in a soft wood handle. It is engraved with Japanese characters, and is straight up the back, with a tapering curve on the cutting edge. Like most Japanese blades, it is as sharp as a razor and finely tempered.

In the side of the Japanese small sword you have probably noticed a smaller blade, which fits in a hollow in the scabbard. It was used in feudal days in Japan as a paper cutter, and also to slash the face in time of war. When a general believed himself to be mortally wounded or likely to be taken prisoner he would take out his paper cutter and mutilate his face beyond recognition, thereby depriving his enemies of the pleasure of carrying his head around on a spear, with his name, rank, and title attached, for the edification of all beholders.

A knife of Shakespeare's time is represented in the colection by a drawing from the original in the British Musem. It looks very much like a razor, and the blade is inscribed with a rhyme, as was the custom in those days:

It was probably written by a jackknife poet. However, it is as good as some modern obtuary poems. I don't imagine the immortal William wrote such verse, although he refers to it when he says: "For all the world like culter's poetry upon a knite, love me and love me not."

One of Daniel Boone's numerous knives is in the museum collection. The drawing will show its appearance better than a description. It is very rusty, and does not look like a dangerous weapon.

An interesting collection of knives made by prisoners out of hoop iron and springs from the soles of shoes is a feature of the series. Most of them are from the Washington jail.

The finest and most complete example of the cutler's art is the knife in the Grant collection. It is the culmination of the jackknife, a regular pocket toolchest. It has three cutting blades, a corkscrew, screwdriver, saw, chisel, button-hook, file, scissors, gimlet, farier's hank, and in a hole in the side is a surgeon's lancet.—Inter-Ocean

MEAT EATING AND TEMPER.

Mrs. Ernest Hart, who accompanied her husband in his recent trip around the world, appears to come to the conclusion that meat eating is bad for the temper. In the Hospital she says that in no country is home rendered so unhappy and life made so miserable by the ill-temper of those who are obliged to live together as in England. If we compare domestic life and manners in England with those of other countries where meat does not form such an integral article of diet, a notable improvement will be remarked. In less meat-eating France, urbanity is the rule of the home; in fish and rice-eating Japan, harsh words are unknown, and an exquisite politeness to one another prevails even among the children who play together in the streets. In Japan I never heard rude, angry words spoken by any but Englishmen. I am strongly of opinion that the ill-temper of the English is caused in a great measure by a too abundant meat dietary, combined with a sedentary life. The half-oxidized products of albumen circulating in the blood produce both mental and moral disturbances. The healthful thing to do is to lead an active and unselfish life, on a moderate diet, sufficient to maintain strength and not increase weight.

The Pillsbury "A" flour mill at Minneapolis has established its claim to being the largest mill in the world. It made a special run Monday week and turned out 9,551 barrels.

Italy gives to the world outside her borders 2,500,000,000 oranges; Spain, 1,400,000,000; Portugal, 80,000,000; Paraguay, 60,000,000; Florida, nearly as many as Paraguay.

It is now proposed to abolish the useless position of attorney for the State Board of Health—which was created to make the people at large give George A. Knight, a Republican spellbinder, $12,000 for making partizan speeches in the interest of Dan Burns and bossing generally—and expend the same amount of money in the purchase and distribution of the diphtheria remedy which is now exciting so much interest in the world. The move is said to have the approval of Governor Budd as well as of the State Board of Health, which admits that it never had any use for an attorney at $3,000 a year. This is merely an example of the reforms the Governor is trying to bring about.

What has come over the world in which we live? It is in a state of agitation, unrest, discomfort, and even revolution against the established order of things. There are wars and rumors of wars, discontent with forms of government and with the social order, quarrels with surroundings, and complaints of everything that does not exactly suit. Is the world worse, or are we less fitted to our environment than our ancestors? Were we compelled to answer our own queries we should be disposed to attribute the friction and unrest to impaired digestion and overstrained nerves. These may not be world diseases, but they are the bane and curse of civilization.

One of the most notable features of the Good Roads Convention was the address of General Roy Stone of the road inquiry office of the Department of Agriculture, and the information given by him will be of great value to the State if our people are wise enough to profit by it. The subject is one of great importance to the farmers, and, indeed, to the cities also, and General Stone's address ought to be published by the State and widely circulated as a means of public education on the question.

One day war between Mexico and Guatemala and the other Central American States is declared to be inevitable, and the next is said that the differences are all to be harmonized without loss of honor to either side. Today is the war day. But bloodshed in foreign countries is something Americans can contemplate without a shudder when they reflect that war is likely to make a demand for our products, both food products and engines of destruction, bullets, torpedoes and dynamite shells.

The assembly committee on ways and means have introduced the appropriation bill and it is found that the recommendations of the governor have been followed pretty closely. It is estimated that a saving of about $1,000,000 over the appropriations of two years ago will be effected, and it is thought that this will be still further reduced another million. There is nothing like a governor with a backbone.

The Valley Railroad is as nearly certain to succeed as any enterprise ever undertaken in California. The personal character and business and financial standing of the men who have taken hold of it are the very best possible guarantee of its genuineness and of actuality. For once, a railroad has been projected in California which will not be built on paper only.

If Kate Field is correct in saying of poker that "its obvious tendency is to develop fixity of purpose, independence of action and a high degree of reserve about one's passing emotions," it might be a good idea to substitute it for football as a part of university education.

Mayor Sutro is in favor of the valley railroad heart and soul, but not in purse. With all of his alleged intense hatred for the "octopus" and he a millionaire, he finds himself short of ready coin and therfore cannot subscribe for the competing line.

It will be more difficult for the Valley Railroad managers to select a route satisfactory to the many towns than it was to get millions on subscriptions.

THE NEW VANDERBILT HOUSE.

An American Mansion Inspected and Approved by New York Society.

Society has examined the new Cornelius Vanderbilt house and pronounced it "magnificent," "superb," "royal"—any adjective, in fact, that describes great size combined with good taste.

The reception the other afternoon was perhaps the largest and most representative ever given in New York, at least 1,500 people making it a point to be there.

It differed, too, from other receptions in that the visitors, instead of standing about in two or three rooms, as is usual, wandered off after paying their compliments to Mrs. Vanderbilt and spent the rest of the afternoon in sightseeing through the long suits of apartments.

"I do believe I have walked a mile!" exclaimed one woman, who was evidently determined that nothing of value should escape her close scrutiny.

The house is indeed an education in itself, with its different styles of decorations, according to different periods, but all blending together in a harmonious whole.

Some of the critics got their Louises pretty well mixed, pronouncing a Henri II room a Louis XV, and a Louis XVI a colonial room, but it didn't make any difference.

The Louises committed and can cover a multitude of sins, and Peter Marie and a few other experts on interior decorations had a splendid time setting some of the women straight on their dates.

The house will of course look even finer when lighted for a ball, with the company in evening dress, but even as it was it truly merited all the praise given and denotes a new era in the splendor of American living.—Cholly Knickerbocker in New York Recorder.

ASHES TO CURE CUTS.

Russian Physicians Revive an Old Cossack Method of Treating Wounds.

Some of the best known physicians in Russia are strongly advocating the adoption in the government hospitals of an old Cossack custom of treating cuts and wounds with ashes. The Cossack peasantry have treated cases in this fashion from time immemorial, and Dr. Pashkoff, a Russian physician who has been studying the treatment, recently said in an interview in a Russian medical journal:

"I strongly recommend the treating of severe cuts and wounds with ashes. Experiment has convinced me of the thorough efficacy of the treatment, and in addition it is cheap, takes little time to arrange and does away with bulky bandages, which have always been the bane of nurses and physicians. The best ashes are those resulting from the burning of some cotton stuff or linen, and only a very thin layer should be applied. If the wound has been made by some dirty instrument and there is danger of blood poisoning, it should be first washed thoroughly with a lotion. The ashes with the blood form a hard substance, under which the most severe cuts heal with remarkable rapidity."

Dr. Pashkoff has experimented with ashes on 25 cases of cuts, and only two of the entire number failed to result successfully. These cases would have been cured, too, had not the nurses failed to apply prescribed lotions to the wounds before the physicians took them in charge. It is extremely probable that the ashes treatment will be adopted in the St. Petersburg hospitals before long.

To Define a Church.

A strange question is being raised in the court here by two saloon keepers who are being prosecuted for running saloons within 300 feet of a church, which is forbidden by the mulct law. They admit that they are within the prescribed distance of the building in question, but deny that it is a church. So the question arises, What is a church? The one complaining is the German Methodist, and it is located on Locust street, one of the principal business streets, and in a good business locality. The church owned this property and concluded to make the most of it. So a substantial three story business block was built there, with stores on the first floor, offices in front on the second floor, and the hall, used as a church, on the second floor, back. The third floor is used by tenants. The jury in one case found that the building was not a church and that it could not keep saloons 300 feet away. The case will undoubtedly be carried to the supreme court to get a definition of what a church is.—Des Moines Dispatch.

The Phonograph In a New Role.

Having possession of a seditious phonograph is the latest instance of disloyalty punished by a jealous continental monarch. The authorities at Triest arrested an Italian guilty of having exhibited a phonograph which played the Italian royal march. The terrible instrument was accused of having disturbed public order because it also registered sundry demonstrations of applause and enthusiastic cries which accompanied the hymn when it was performed. The musical patriot has been obliged to leave the town and take with him the subversive instrument.—Triest Correspondent.

The Trilby Craze.

The Trilby enthusiasm in New York city has had some amusing results. The "Trilby waltz" is affected by certain young people who read not wisely, but too much; the "Trilby collar" is a novelty in certain stores; the "Trilby lisp," whatever that may be, is a subject of gossip in up town boarding schools. Du Maurier's pebble made a great many circles when it splashed into the mill pond of modern life.—New York World.

MAKING BEESWAX.

A New and Easy Process as Described by a Southern Beekeeper.

I have just discovered a new and easy way to make beeswax, and just as fine wax as can be made by the solar plan—no difference how old and tough the combs are.

Take a half barrel and arrange a cloth so that it will swing down about half way of the barrel. Any strong porous cloth will do, or wire cloth is good. Then boil the old combs in a copper or tin vessel till all is thoroughly heated, putting the combs right into the water, just as if you were going to cook it. Have some clean, boiling water in another vessel—enough to fill the half barrel one-third full. Pour the boiling water into the half barrel first, then pour the melted combs, water and all, into the strainer. Cover up the barrel with two thicknesses of gunny sacking, let it alone for a day or two, then go around when you are ready for the wax, loosen the hoops so as to let out the water and you will feel astonished to see how nearly all the wax is drained out.

The larger the amount of combs you have the larger barrel you will need. The hot water in the barrel keeps the whole contents hot for 12 hours, gives all the dirt and dregs time to settle to the bottom, the wax cools so slowly that it does not crack, the staves of the barrel spread out and leave the wax. All in all, it is the easiest way to make beeswax, aside from the solar plan, that I know of, and can be done at any time of the year, and no combs are too old or tough to work, as with the solar plan. And then we have our wax thoroughly cleansed at one operation.

If you will only give this plan a trial, you will find that you can do away with a whole lot of muss and bother, and the whole operation of making 25 to 50 pounds of wax need not take more than one hour of your time.

Thus writes Mrs. Jennie Atchley of Beeville, Tex., in The American Bee Journal.

Sowing Red Clover.

Red clover seed is usually sown in the spring. If sown very early, severe frosts afterward may destroy the young plants. If sown later, there is some danger that dry weather may come on before the young plants have become well rooted. It is safer to sow as soon as danger of severe freezing is past. Sowing on a late snow is liked much by many, as the snow helps the sower to secure uniform distribution of the seed, and as it melts the snow helps carry the seed into the soft surface. It is usually difficult to at once harrow or roll the soil if the seed is sown early because of the moisture. If seeding is delayed, or if the surface is dry enough, light harrowing or rolling is desirable. It is assumed the soil is in good condition.

If the ground is in good condition, 10 to 12 pounds per acre should be an abundance of seed. If the ground is not well prepared, it may be well to sow more, expecting a considerable percentage of the seed not to grow. We like the plan of twice sowing—sowing half the seed and then cross sowing with the other half. This helps to secure a more even distribution of the seed. The young plants should be allowed to get a fair growth before they are cut or eaten off, and at no time the first season should they be closely pastured.

Thrashing Corn.

Farmers vary somewhat in their ideas about thrashing corn. A Kansas farmer who has had experience says that a good run of corn thrashing in the fall means a new outfit of spikes throughout before beginning on the next crop of small grain. A Wisconsin man tells that if the corn is well dried it will thrash out nearly as fast as small grain, and that the stock eat the stover better than that run through a cutter. An Iowa farmer tells his way in The Farm, Field and Fireside. He says:

Remove all the teeth from concaves unless the corn is damp. In that case leave in one row of teeth; then rig the chaffer the same as for flax and put in the oat or barley sieve, and you are ready for business. The corn, if fed by hand, feeds best butts first. The self feeder is used here, and it works to perfection, saving all the corn and cutting the stover nice and fine.

A New Ditch Projected

During the past two years about twenty farmers have settled on the desert lands between Independence and Blackrock. They are all people of small means, but used to the labor and hardship incident to life in a new country. Without water their lands are practically valueless, while with irrigation beautiful homes and valuable holdings can be secured. These people held a meeting at Camp Independence last Saturday to discuss ways and means of securing the needed water. A committee was appointed to investigate the feasibility of constructing a ditch from Owens river and a meeting will be held at the eight mile house ranch two weeks hence to hear the report. There is no doubt but that the plan is thoroughly practicable. The interested parties all have teams, and as one of them expressed it, "plenty of hard days work in them" it will require twenty miles of ditch, and each individual is capable of constructing one mile of it. It will be a great benefit to the town of Independence, and we can well afford to give the project any encouragement in our power.

Fish Springs School

Pursuant to notice, the electors of Fish Springs School District met at the school house on the evening of the 9th of Feb. 1895 for the purpose of reviewing the complaints of Mrs. Attie Lane and Mrs. McKellips preferred against the school teacher, Miss Daren.

On motion, J. W. Gilkey was chosen Chairman, Mrs. Attie Jones, Clerk of the Board of Trustees, as Secretary.

On motion the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, By the Electors of Fish Springs School District, that after a careful review of the complaints of Mrs. Attie Lane and Mrs. McKellips against the teacher, Miss Daren, in the aforesaid district; does not show incompetency, a want of moral character, or a neglect of duty; but it appears from the evidence that the teacher was trying to enforce the school laws which were her bounden duty to do.

Resolved; That it is the sense of this meeting the teacher, Miss Daren, be, and is hereby honorably acquitted of any and all charges affecting her capacity, or her rights as a teacher in the aforesaid district and the Trustees are accordingly so instructed.

Resolved: That a copy of these resolutions be served on each of the Trustees.

MRS. ATTIE JONES,
Secretary.

Bronco is Dead

Bronco the well known chestnut horse by Joe Hooker out of Laura Wiston, by Norfolk, dropped dead on the Oakland track recently. He ran a great many credible races in Jack Garrity's hands, at all distances from six furlongs to a mile and a half. Bronco was once owned by an Oakland man. About two years ago the horse was "nerved.—Breeder & Sportsman.

Bronco was bred by Theodore Winters, from whom he was purchased by the late Baron Pesler about six years ago and brought to Owens Valley. He was bought from the Pesler estate four years ago by John McBride, who took him to San Francisco in 1892. He was bred to a large number of mares while here, none of them however being firstclass. The majority of his get are undersized, and while some of them show a high turn of speed, none of them can go further than three furlongs.

Of Interest To Travelers

Under the new timetable adopted by the C & C passengers to and from Owens Valley lay over at Hawthorne instead of Belleville, as formerly. There is good hotel accommodations at Hawthorne and travelers will find the "Nucleus" a firstclass house. An excellent table is set and the rooms are neat and well kept and the beds comfortable. The proprietor is constantly attentive to the wants of his guests and all are treated with uniform courtesy. You needn't take our word for it, either, but stop at the Nucleus and see for yourself.

Severe Accident.

The following is taken from the Examiner of the 8th:

Patrick Reddy, the attorney, met with a painful accident yesterday morning while attempting to alight from a Sutter-street car near the crossing at Grant-avenue. His foot slipped on the step as he started to jump off and he was thrown violently to the street. A carriage was summoned and he was taken to the Receiving Hospital, where it was found he had sustained a serious laceration of the muscles and ligaments of the knee.

Contest Dismissed.

The McGee-Given contest case was called in the Superior Court last Saturday. Counsel for the defendant moved that the case be dismissed and after argument the motion was taken under advisement until Monday. On that date Judge Arnot granted the motion and the case was dismissed. Counsel for the Plaintiff excepted as a basis for appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mrs. A. Stewart of Lone Pine offers for sale the Whitney House, located at that place. It is the only hotel in Lone Pine and has a good location. It is the headquarters and starting point for tourist parties to the Sierras and Mt. Whitney. Mrs. Stewart is well along in years and in poor health, consequently unable to conduct the business. For further particulars call upon or address Mrs. A. Stewart, Lone Pine Cal.

F. McIver arrived home last Monday evening from a visit to Carson, San Francisco and Sacramento. While at the latter place he called upon Assemblyman Coleman in reference to the Fair appropriation, who states that he has little hopes of its passage.

Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz gave a birthday party last Saturday evening for her sons, Masters Julian and Eddie. About forty little folks were present and enjoyed themselves as only little folks can. Each of the boys received many handsome gifts.

H. T. Stebbins passed through town on Wednesday with about 100 head of horses on his way home to Ventura county. Al Tate and Charley Walters occompanied him.

The County Board of Education will meet next Tuesday for the purpose of examining candidates and transacting such other business as may come before it.

HOUSEKEEPERS who are wise will not be persuaded into the purchase of the unreliable baking powders which some dealers wish to sell for the sake of the additional profit derived therefrom. Crudely mixed from low-grade, impure ingredients, such powders cost but half as much to make as the highly refined, absolutely pure Royal Baking Powder, although retailed at the same price. They are unwholesome and lacking in leavening strength.

Royal Baking Powder gives the greatest value for its cost, and there is no other powder or preparation that will give such satisfaction, or make such pure, wholesome and delicious food, or which in practical use will be found so economical.

Quaint Old Time Will.

R. W. Amsden, a Brockton police officer, has in his possession a printed copy of the will of Joseph Porter, made in East Stoughton (now Avon) on Feb. 16, 1802. Mr. Porter was born in 1730 and died in 1803. The most interesting part of the will is that relating to what he left his wife, Elizabeth, as follows:

"The easterly end or half of my new dwelling house, and so much of the cellar as is necessary for her use; also one-half of the buttery in the other part of the house, and the privilege of the oven, well, dooryard, etc., during her natural life; also the improvement of one good cow, which is to be kept on my farm for her use during her natural life; also one good yearling hog, well fatted, yearly, and nine bushels of Indian corn and three bushels of rye, a sufficiency of wood to keep one fire, cut up fit for the hearth," etc.

To his son Joseph he gave, with other property, "my horse for the purpose of helping his mother to meeting on the Lord's day as often as she is able and inclined."—Boston Globe.

Using the Recoil.

The recoil force of any gun is far more than sufficient to work the gun if properly employed. In all patterns of quick firing guns it is stored by means of helical steel springs and thus is utilized to return the gun instantly to the firing point, and it is also utilized by the Elswick firm to open and close the breech. So far automatic gear has already got beyond the experimental stage. What is now required is some simple and handy arrangement which shall instantly bring the change to the loading position when required, and not before, and as quickly run it home, and yet shall permit the training and elevating to be absolutely continuous, so that the aim may be kept steadily on the mark without reference to the working of the gear.

In this way any desirable rate and great precision of fire could be assured. The main difficulty would appear to be in making the gear simple, and not liable to get out of order, and in keeping it effectually sheltered behind shields no larger than those now in use. The problem is serious, but with the example of Maxim before them engineers will hardly regard it as insoluble.—Contemporary Review.

I was under doctors' care for two years with womb disease, and gradually wasting in strength all the time. I was so weak that I could sit up in bed only a few moments, for two years. I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and his 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and by the time I had taken one-half dozen bottles I was up and going wherever I pleased, and have had good health and been very strong ever since—that was two years and a half ago."

Right of Way For Funerals.

"The superstitious think it's bad luck to cross a funeral," said a man, "but it would by no means do to assume that every person who waits for a funeral to pass is superstitious. There are plenty of persons who halt out of respect for the dead, and there are some who seem to consider that the dead and the mourners are entitled to something more than respect—that the funeral has the right of way. It was such a feeling as this, no doubt, and not superstition, that prompted the action of a gripman that I rode down town with the other day on a Broadway car. At Canal street we met a funeral going east. At the rate at which we were moving we would just about have met a carriage about midway in the procession.

"Of course the gripman could easily have held his way. He could have pounded his gong, and no doubt the driver of the carriage would have held up. As a matter of fact, the driver had already begun to pull up, expecting that the gripman would demand the right to go first. But the gripman's gong was silent. Instead, swinging round slowly but surely on the brake wheel, he nodded at the same time to the left, indicating to the driver that he should go first, which he did, moving with a little added celerity as he went, as an acknowledgment of the gripman's courtesy. As there was room before the next carriage, the gripman sounded his gong, released the brake wheel, let on the grip and went on. He had, so far as was consistent with his duties to the living, rendered due homage to the dead."—New York Sun.

A WOMAN'S HEART.

One Disease That Baffles the Physician.

The Story of a Woman Who Suffered for Nine Years—How She Was Cured.

(From the Newark, N. J., Evening News.)

Valvular disease of the heart has always been considered incurable. The following interview therefore, will interest the medical profession, since it describes the successful use of a new treatment for this disease. The patient is MRS. GEO. ARCHER, of Clifton, N. J., and this publication by the News is the first mention made of the case by any newspaper. All physicians consulted pronounced the patient suffering with valvular disease of the heart, and treated her without the slighest relief. MRS. ARCHER said: "I could not walk across the floor; neither could I go up stairs without stopping to let the pain in my chest and left arm cease. I felt an awful constriction about my arm and chest as though I were tied with ropes. Then there was a terrible noise at my right ear, like the labored breathing of some great animal. I have often turned expecting to see some creature at my side.

"Last July," continued MRS. ARCHER, "I was at Springfield, Mass., visiting, and my mother showed me an account in the Springfield Examiner, telling of the wonderful cures effected by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. My mother urged me to try the pills and on November 25th last I bought a box and began taking them, and I have taken them ever since, except for a short interval. The first box did not seem to benefit me, but I persevered, encouraged by the requests of my relatives. After beginning on the second box, to my wonder, the noise at my right ear ceased entirely. I kept right on and the distress that I used to feel in my chest and arm gradually disappeared. The blood has returned to my face, lips and ears, which were entirely devoid of color, and I feel well and strong again.

"My son, too, had been troubled with gastritis and I induced him to try the Pink Pills, with great benefit. I feel that everybody ought to know of my wonderful cure, and I bless God that I have found something that has given me this great relief."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are now given to the public as an unfailing blood builder and nerve restorer, curing all forms of weakness arising from a watery condition of the blood or shattered nerves, two fruitful causes of most every ill that flesh is heir to. These pills are also a specific for the troubles peculiar to females, such as suppressions, all forms of weakness, chronic constipation, bearing down pains, etc., and in the case of men will give speedy relief and effect a permanent cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork, or excesses of whatever nature. The pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent postpaid on receipt of price, (50 cents a box, or 6 boxes for $2.50—they are never sold in bulk, or by the 100) by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

By DAVID KER.

CHAPTER II.

AT THE LAST MOMENT.

"I see him!" cried the viscount.

"What a savage that old man must be!" muttered an eminent New York doctor, issuing with a flushed face from a splendid room in one of the largest up town hotels late on the same night that witnessed "Never-die Joe's" resurrection. "His relations, if he has any, ought to be glad to get rid of him—as they will pretty soon, for he can't live through the night. If this is a fair sample of the British aristocracy, I shall be more than ever thankful that I'm an American."

And well might he say so, for these words, uttered by a voice harsh and broken with pain, followed him through the doorway:

"You doctors are quacks and impostors, every man of you! What did those wretched fools know who sent me over here to die, instead of regaining my health, as they said I should do? And as for you, have you any medicine that can soothe this pain for a moment, or retard my death for a single hour? Not you! Be off with you, then, and leave me to die unmolested!"

The hired nurse, dismissed in the same polite fashion, had hurried out of the room likewise, glad to escape, and the doomed man was left alone with his own black and bitter thoughts.

With what were those thoughts busy as he lay there in his lonely weariness and pain beneath the deepening shadow of the grave? Did he look back for half a century through the gloomy vista of a wasted life to see himself once more the handsome, dashing, reckless young viscount who had been the wildest and wickedest roue at the evil court of George IV? Did he live again through the cruel disappointments and mad debaucheries that had doomed him to a premature age and a torturing death? Did he stand once more by the deathbed of his only daughter, cut off in the first bloom of her girlhood by a cruel disease? or did he see in fancy the handsome, imperious face of his only son, banished from his home forever for daring to thwart his tyrant father's plan of a "good match" for him by giving his heart to the beautiful but penniless American orphan, who had been his sick sister's teacher, companion and only friend?

And was this the end of it all? What did all his wealth and all his rank profit him now? Surrounded by useless luxuries, which seemed only to mock his misery; old, worn out, childless, hated by all who knew him, he was dying the death of a wounded wild beast in its den. All his life long he had been bent on having his own way, and this was whither his own way had led him.

"How all my tenants will clap their hands," he growled, "and shout that the devil has got his own at last! And how the next heir, curse him! will chuckle over all the rich lands that the old bear has had to leave behind him! By Heaven, if I could blow up the castle and burn the whole estate, and leave him nothing to inherit but dust and ashes, I'd do it! Ah! if Arthur had not disobeyed me I should not be left to die like this, alone and uncared for! Perhaps I may have been to blame too, but it is too late to think of that now—too late!"

"Never too late!" said a clear, sweet voice behind him; and in the doorway stood a young girl, looking down upon him with a deep, womanly pity in her beautiful face which made it seem lovelier than ever. This was the girl whom he had hated and cursed as the cause of his son's disobedience, but whom he had none the less kept in his household as having been the chosen friend of his dead daughter, the only being whom he had ever really loved.

"Ha!" muttered the viscount, "are you come to see me die like a dog? Well, if you want your revenge, you have it now, to the full."

"I want none," she answered, gliding across the room as noiselessly as a sunbeam, and standing beside him. "Won't you let me try if I can do anything to help you?"

"What can you do?" asked the dying man with savage impatience. "I am dying—I know it—and if there be a hereafter, as the priests tell us, I have less to hope for there than here. What does it matter? As I have sown, so must I reap."

"Do not talk so wildly and despairingly," said Constance Leigh earnestly. "It is not too late yet to undo what you have done."

At the last words the sick man's face changed, and he glanced up at her with a sharp, suspicious look.

"Lord Doneraile," said she, with an air of quiet dignity which the fierce old noble himself had never surpassed in his proudest days, "I know what you are going to say, and I must not let you say it. Now that you have but a few hours to live, it is time for me to speak plainly. You thought that I loved your son only because he was rich and great, and you wronged me cruelly in thinking so. I love him better now that he is poor and nameless and forsaken than I ever did when he was heir to the finest estate in the south of Ireland; but if you will forgive him and restore him to his rights, I will pledge you my word—and you know I have never broken it—that I will never see him again."

The viscount eyed her with a look of blank amazement.

"You will do that, you?" said he in an incredulous tone.

"I will, so help me God!" replied Constance solemnly.

"There is one person in the world, then, who is not utterly selfish," growled the old man, cynical to the very last. "Well, I believe you, and I'll give you a proof of it. Look in the pocket of my dressing gown and you'll find a letter, which I had just received when this cursed attack came on. You can read it."

Constance did so. Short as the letter was, it sufficed to make her face flush and her whole frame quiver with excitement, and hardly pausing to read the last word, she moved swiftly across the room, and taking the dying man's cold hand in both her own said pleadingly:

"You will have him sought for, will you not, now that you know where to search for him?"

"Who knows if he is still alive? The men of our race know how to die when life has nothing left to offer them," said the old noble with a kind of dreary pride.

"He is alive—I feel it," said the girl emphatically, "and he will be found. See how this news of him has come to you just in time, as if sent by God himself. If you know the very regiment in which he enlisted (and this officer seems quite sure of what he says) it will be easy to trace him."

"But whom can I send to do it? It is not every one who could be tempted even by money to venture into the midst of a raging war, and pass through a country that has been turned into a desert, with the risk of being shot or hanged at every step. Who will undertake the search?"

"I will!"

"You?" cried the viscount, "a young girl like you! Impossible!"

"Why should I not?" said Constance simply. "In time of war a woman can often pass where a man cannot, and no American woman has any harm to fear when she goes among American men, whether northern or southern."

As she spoke her fair young face lighted up with a glow of heroic daring that quite transfigured it for the moment, and made the sick man's heavy eyes turn to her with a look of wondering admiration.

"You are indeed worthy of him," said he, seeming to catch a spark of her enthusiasm; "and if thanks or blessings are worth anything from me you have them both. But if you take up this search, how do you mean to set about it?"

"I have had plenty of practice in nursing, as you know; and just now nurses with any experience are very much wanted everywhere. I shall make my way south, and volunteer to help in the hospitals; and I have no fear but what I shall be accepted."

The old man seemed to meditate for a few moments, and then he drew a long breath, as if bracing himself for some final effort, and said more firmly:

"Yes, that will doubtless be the best plan; but, in any case, you must not go alone. Take my man Dawson with you; he's a sharp fellow, with plenty of courage; he may be useful to you in case of need. Now, hand me that cordial on the table; I must keep up my strength, for I have much to do yet, and little enough time left to do it in."

The peasants of Munster were wont to say that the "bad Fortescues," as they expressively called the wild race to which the viscount belonged, had "always the most life in thim jist whin they wor goin' to die;" and this saying was as true of the last Lord Doneraile as of his terrible forefathers. Propped up with pillows, he wrote rapidly for nearly half an hour without once pausing to rest, while the sick room was a scene of incessant though perfectly noiseless bustle—people coming and going, servants gliding off on errands or returning from them, and Constance Leigh herself standing ready to give to the invalid the various things for which he asked from time to time.

At length all seemed to be done, and the old man, sinking back exhausted on his pillow, said faintly:

"I have done as you asked me, Constance; are you satisfied?"

The girl's only answer was to bend over him and kiss his forehead; but that simple, childlike caress said more than any words.

Then followed a long silence, broken at length by the now low and feeble voice of the dying man:

"You look tired, my poor child; will you not go and rest?"

"I won't leave you," she answered simply; and another long pause ensued, in the dead hush of which was heard the ghostly tick of the clock, marking off the last moments of that wasted life. In the subdued light the strongly marked face that lay powerlessly back on the pillow began to assume a weird likeness to the fleshless outline of a skull, and Constance Leigh, though as brave as any soldier who had fought that day at Gettysburg, felt herself shrinking instinctively from what seemed like the visible presence of death.

At last the sick man spoke again, in a voice which was now barely above a whisper:

"Will you pray for me, Constance? I cannot, for it would be like a coward to cry for mercy, now that I am helpless, after having laughed at such things all my life when I was strong and full of health, but if there is a God, he will surely hear such prayers as yours."

And Constance did pray for him with all her heart and soul. She forgot the countless insults hurled at her by this man's bitter tongue—his mean suspicions of her, the cruel wrong that she and her lover had suffered at his hands, and remembered only that he was dying, and that he had no one to care for him or to love him.

Another draught of the cordial revived the failing man once more, and he spoke with all his wonted firmness:

"When you find him—for find him you will—tell him I forgive him, and ask him to forgive me; and when you are happy together"——

He broke off suddenly, and the girl, looking at him, saw that he had lifted his head and seemed to be gazing intently, not at her, but at something behind her. Then she remembered that the "bad Fortescues" were credited with the gift of second sight, and though she put no faith in the weird superstition, it awed her in spite of herself.

"I see him," cried the viscount; "he is alone among them all, but they cannot kill him—he lives still! The first peril is past, but the second is still to come. It comes! He has escaped it; but the third peril—the third!"

And with that bitter cry on his lips the "wild Lord Doneraile" sank back and died.

If, however, men like Walter Camp of Yale and Dr. Brooks of Harvard, men who have always worked in the interests of clean sport, can be induced to act as umpires and to enforce the rules to the letter, there still remains a chance for good, honest, manly foot-ball. The choice must be between clean, manly, honest foot-ball games and no games whatever.—Boston Advertiser.

Boiling Water During the Summer.

A medical friend of the Listener writes him to do something to arouse public sentiment betimes to the duty of filtering and boiling drinking water this summer. He thinks that, in view of the possibility of cholera, people should acquire the water boiling habit as soon as possible. No doubt this is quite true. And, cholera or no cholera, there are no end of germs in the ordinary water of Boston and the towns about. It is really extraordinary how our people have kept up so long the practice of drinking water without filtering or boiling it, and still more extraordinary, no doubt, that we should cool our water by putting ice into it, when it can be cooled just as effectively by putting a large bottle of it corked into a refrigerator or otherwise into contact with ice.

A good way out of the difficulty, if one thinks he does not like boiled water, is to drink no water at all. There are plenty of other things to drink. From all accounts, cholera can be taken only through the stomach, and there is nothing so discouraging to a microbe of any sort as a temperature of 212 degrees.—Boston Transcript.

ELECTRIC WIRES.

Some writer very aptly likens the nerves to electric wires, and the general working of their system to that of electric cars. A man who "slips his trolley" like Mr. Jeremiah Eney, 1812 W. Lombard street, Baltimore, Md., will need something better than even a galvanic battery to set him all right. Mr. Eney found that something in the following way: "I suffered," he says, "a long time with neuralgia in the head. I gave St. Jacobs Oil a fair trial and am entirely cured." In this way the great remedy acts as a motorman to restore broken wires and set the system to perfect action.

EXERCISE.

One reason for the fact that the general health of the community is growing better every year is that more people take regular exercise. Exercise, however, has its difficulties. If indulged in a little too long, or so violently as to make one liable to take cold, it results in stiffness and soreness of the muscles and joints.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are invaluable in such cases. Placed on the back, the chest, on the limbs, they afford instant relief, and leave the muscles free from all soreness. Some athletes cut them into strips and apply them to parts of the limbs where they could not put a whole PLASTER, and find that they are a great relief and assistance.

A LUCKY WATCHMAN.

FREDERICK KUNERT, OF THE BOATMEN'S BANK, PLAYS IN GREAT LUCK.

He Draws One of the Big Prizes in the Honduras National Lottery.

The Boatmen's Bank is the swell bank of St. Louis. It is also the oldest bank. Formerly the Boatmen's did business on the river, and river men, big and little, made it their repository. Now the Boatmen's is in posssession of palatial quarters of its own at the Northwest corner of Fourth Street and Washington Avenue. There were hundreds of clerks at work when The Sporting News man called there yesterday, but the happiest mortal about the place was Frederick Kunert, who occupies the humble position of watchman.

Draft Clerk Abrams was also looking happy. He had just returned to the bank building with Kunert. He had been at the office of the Adams Express Company identifying Kunert as the man who had drawn one-fifth of the $5,000 prize given by the Honduras National Lottery Company in their November drawing. He held ticket No. 79823.

When Kunert and Abrams returned to the Boatmen's Bank with more money than Kunert had ever owned individually in all his life before, there was quite a commotion in the big bank building and all hands wanted to know what he was going to do with his money.

Kunert replied: I am going to invest it right in this bank, in bank securities. With this money in bank I will always feel independent and as though I had something to fall back on."

Around the bank it was said that Kunert's ticket was one of thirteen the clerks in the Boatmen's Bank had been in the habit of buying each month.

Kunert said: "This is only the second ticket I have purchased in the Honduras National Lottery, and I have such good luck I guess I will have to give that company's tickets another twirl. What I like about their way of doing business is that the prize which I won was paid me so promptly, in fact immediately the moment my identification was made known."—*St. Louis, (Mo.) Disordered Nerves

"For three long years I was a dreadful sufferer with stomach trouble. My nerves, too, were in an awful condition, and the least bit of noise would startle me. One of our neighbor's was very persistent in urging me to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and at last I concluded to do so. Before I had taken one bottle, I began to get better.

High Government Authority.

No authority of greater experience on food products exists than Dr. Henry A. Mott, of New York. Dr. Mott's wide experience as Government Chemist for the Indian Department, gave him exceptional opportunities to acquaint himself with the qualities and constituent parts of baking powders. He understands thoroughly the comparative value of every brand in the market, and has from time to time expressed his opinion thereof. On a recent careful re-examination and analysis he finds superior to all others in strength, purity, and efficiency. Dr. Mott writes:—

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder

"New York, March 20th, 1894.

I find Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder to be superior to all others, for the following reasons:—

1st. It liberates the greatest amount of leavening gas and is consequently more efficient.

2nd. The ingredients used in its preparation are of the purest character.

3rd. Its keeping qualities are excellent.

4th. On account of the purity of the materials and their relative proportions, Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder must be considered the acme of perfection as regards wholesomeness and efficiency, and I say this having in mind certificates I have given several years ago respecting two other baking powders.

The reasons for the change in my opinion are based on the above facts and the new method adopted to prevent your baking powder from caking and deteriorating in strength.

THE WORLD THEIR PARISH.

The Dr. Liebig World Dispensary and International Medical and Surgical Institute, both by the vastness of its business and the universal good done by it, reminds one of the late John Wesley, who was wont to observe, "The World is My Parish." It is an acknowledged fact that ever since its inception the Dr. Liebig World Dispensary has continued to turn out cure after cure in cases which had been considered hopeless and incurable. The doctors comprising its staff of physicians are all medical men of large experience and recognized ability, and those suffering with chronic complaints may feel safely anchored when they have put themselves under the Institute's care. Diseases peculiar to men receive special attention at the hands of these learned practitioners, and here, indeed, it may be said, "a stitch in time saves nine." Cases of this nature, unless speedily and intelligently attended to, usually result in complications whose name is Legion and whose effect is premature and untimely death. A responsible institution, such as the leading authorities all over the United States have concurred in asserting the Dr. Liebig Dispensary to be, is invaluable to sufferers in instances of the above nature, for its staff swiftly, speedily and secretly restores them to their pristine condition by eradicating from the system the disease germs and places their feet once more on the broad macadamized road leading to health and happiness and worldly enjoyment. The Dr. Liebig World Dispensary is one of the best equipped and most skilfully arranged institutes of the kind to be found on the coast; the best guarantee of what it can do for you is what it has done for others, and the best diplomas which its celebrated staff of physicians and surgeons can show are not those which hang upon their walls but those which are written in the ruddy characters upon the contented faces of all who have been their patients.

The Dr. Liebig World Dispensary employs no solicitors or cappers to bring patients to its doors. Like Wisdom, she sits back upon her throne conscious of the good she can do for you if haply you but seek her out and find her, but the dignified staff disdains to adopt the methods of transient quacks to bring patients within the perview of her health-giving power. Patients, both male and female, will find this old-established institute just what they want to restore the flush of health to their check and the elasticity of youth to their walk. The Dr. Liebig Company has been treating all the chronic, private and complicated diseases of men and women for twenty-five years in San Francisco. Their offices are open for free consultation from 9 A. M. to 8 P. M. on week days, and 10 A. M. to 1 P. M. Sundays. Home treatment given to those who cannot visit the offices at 100 Geary street. HOW ANNIMALS TALK.

Language Methods of Beasts, Birds and Fishes.

HOW BIRDS CONVEY INTELLIGENCE.

The Vocal Appeal of a Fish—Talk of the Humming Bird—Loud Sounds of the Drum Fish.

My interest in the language of the lower animals was first aroused by a vocal appeal which a fish made to me in the Gulf of Mexico. I was fishing on the edge of a coral reef, where the rich green of the coral heads rapidly gave way to the blue water of the channel, when I hooked and brought up a fish about eight inches in length, of an old-gold color, marked with scarlet lines and touches—a most attractive little creature. As I took it in my hand to remove the hook, I was attracted by its eyes, which were lustrous with yellow and red tints, but especially as they seemed to roll up at me in a supplicating way. Then it began to talk with me, after the fashion of its kind, uttering at first a plaintive grunt, then a series of croaks which seemed to rise in inflection then die away gradually. Then it would croak, almost bark, until finally I tossed the fish back into its native element, fairly conquered by the sounds it uttered, amid the laughter and possibly scorn of my companion, who was too professional to be influenced by the croaks of a "grunt."

The little fish was a member of a large family (Haemulon) in that vicinity, nearly all of whom were grunters and croakers if not talkers, and remarkable for the variety of sounds they produced.

A large number of fishes utter sounds. I have heard the common dog fish utter a curious sound that has been construed into a bark. The eel makes a low croaking noise, said to be musical. The little sea horse utters a single note so far as known, while the gizzard shad is a "talker," but none of these equal the little Haemulon, that grunted and barked its way to liberty in the Mexican Gulf.

The sounds made by fishes are uttered in various ways, and many I think are involuntary. Some are made by the action of the pneumatic duct and swimming bladder, while in other fishes the lips and inter-maxillary bones have something to do with the sound. In fishes of the genuus Zens and Trigla there is a low murmuring sound produced by the swimming bladder, which has an opening and closing diaphragm. The cat fish utters sounds by forcing air from the swimming bladder into the vesophagus. In the sea horse referred to the note is produced by the vibrations of samll voluntary muscles.

The loudest sound producer is the drum fish, which in some way utters drumming nots that have alarmed seafarers off the New Jersey coast. In China, on one occasion, a sound was heard by the officers and crew of an English man of war, coming up from the water like the twanging of a great harp and was referred to a school of fishes.

Sound travels very slowly under water, and with difficulty. I remember once diving with a companion, each holding two stones, which we knocked together in turn, and at five feet distance I could not hear the sound made by my companion.

I believe nearly all animals have a language or method of communication, though not always vocal. The sensory organs of fishes are well developed, and they can track each other by scent when out of sight. In the deep sea the phosphorescent lights of fishes are signals which may have some significance in communication. Some fishes have two or more lights of different colors, like a steamboat or ship. This is true of the malacostens niger. On one side it has a golden light, on the other the light is green.

The ordinary domestic fowl affords the most positive evidence of the possession of a language that is understood. There are many decidedly different calls, which if taken down in a phonograph and repeated in a hen house or yard would produce interesting results. I need but mention a few calls to illustrate the range of the sounds in the domestic fowl. On a warm day, when hens are released from their coop, when their minds are undisturbed and all nature looks bright and inviting, they sing as they feed—a continuous repetition of kerr-kerr-kerr, with various modulations. The rooster never utters it, nor the mother hen, it is the song of the happy-go-lucky of hen creation.

Now let a hawk appear in the sky or any disturbing element an entirely different sound is heard. The hen stops, strecthes her head upward, and with the cock utters a decided note of warning in a high falsetto, k-a-r-r-r-r-e! And if the enemy still comes on it is repeated, and every bird in the vicinity lowers its head and runs to cover. The sound says in the gallus language: "An enemy is coming, run!" and run they do, the kerr-kerr-kerr being continued only when all danger is past. Note the joyous call of the hen that has laid an egg. Cut cut, ca-da-cut! comes oft repeated from the hen house, and other envious hens are informed beyond any question or mistake that Mrs. Gallus has laid an egg.

Now, when these eggs are hatched we have other and maternal notes. There is a deep, monotonous cluck, cluck! that is a warning to others and a gentle admonition to the chicks to remain near, but it is not a call. Note the difference when the mother or the proud cock finds a worm. The cock appears to be greatly excited, and he pretends to peck at it, make the guileless hens believe that he is about to devour the bon bouche himself, all the time he is saying cut, cut, cut—come, come, come, come—rapidly, which causes the hens to run pell-mell in his direction, to find in many instances nothing, it being merely a device to call the flock away from some rival. But in the case of the mother the little ones always find some tid-bit which she has discovered.

I will not attempt to reproduce the baby talk of the old hen to her chicks, but it exists in great variety, and is suggestive of tenderness, affection and solicitude. When the hen has her brood beneath her ample folds she often utters a sound like c-r-a-w-z-z-e of half warning and contentment. And when an intruder enters the coop after dark she utters a high, prolonged whistling note like w-h-o-o-e, softly repeated, indicative of wonder and slight alarm.

If now the fox or coyote or other enemy seize her how quickly comes an entirely different cry—a scream of terror and alarm, c-i-a-i-i-o-u, repeated again and again, and so full of meaning that the owner some dsitance away reaches for his shotgun and answers the signal of distress.

Among the songbirds there are many such notes. Especially have I noticed it in a family of mocking birds that nest in a peach tree not far from my window. The cry of alarm given by the mother when I took out one of the nestlings was a loud sucking, clucking note that invariably brought not only the mate but an entire flock of blackbirds that nestled in an adjoining orange grove, all gathering around me, uttering loud and discordant notes, menacing me from every point of vantage and suggesting that the mocking bird dialect of the peach tree was understood by the blackbirds of the orange grove tribe.

Undoubtedly all birds have a more or less well defined means of communication though differing. A pelican hissed in asthmatic tones at me. My owls had a limited vocabulary, but looked volumes through their expressive eyes.

The humming bird has a dainty song and delicate note which I hear among the nasturtiums—chit-chit-chit; and the parring love note of the pigeon is well known.

Among the higher animals there is often a range of sound that does duty as a language. The cats have a wide range, from the plaintive call for admittance to the purr of content and the snarl of rage and its varied modifications.

The whale has a voice, if we may believe the old writers. One is called the "caa'ing" whale, from its alleged voice, and no less a naturalist than Lacepede quotes Duhamel as authority regarding the norqual, "the lamentable and terrible cries" it was supposed to utter.

The dogs combine with voice, movements of the hair, tail, eyes and ears in speaking. The low growl is accompanied with rigidity of the body, the canine teeth gleam brightly as a warning, and the entire appearance speaks of rage. How opposite is its appearance when greeting its master and fawning at his feet!

The snake would hardly be considered to possess language, but that it can call its young has been demonstrated. Colonel Nicholas Pike, former consul to Mauritius, told me that he had heard a garter snake call its young as he approached by a "peculiar noise," at which they wriggled toward her and ran down her throat for safety—a common trick among various snakes. Colonel Pike observed this on several occasions; so it is evident the mother snake has a vocal call that is understood by its young.

Who can doubt that the strange noises made by insects have not some meaning understood by them; the song of the locust, the shrill note of the katydid, the chirp of the cricket that carries us back to days long buried in the memory. These sounds are not vocal, but instrumental. The grasshopper fiddles to his mate, and the cricket stridulates his song, while the locust drums. The noise of the grasshopper is made by rubbing the thighs against the forewing. The former is serrated for the purpose, and under the glass resembles a saw. In the locusts the base of the anterior wing is transparent, forming a drum with which the males do their talking, the various species uttering different sounds, which, it is said, differ day and night. When the katydid utters its call the lips are silent, but there is a vigorous rubbing of the inner surface of the hind legs against the outer surface of the front wings, while the male cricket elevates its forewing and rubs them against the hind pair. What a fiddling and chirping there is on summer nights or drumming on the warm days when the cicada comes out. If these are not calls, sounds with meaning, then nature has for once provided something more than useless.

Some of the butterflies utter a clicking sound. Beetles have remarkable odors by which they distinguish one another and no one can watch ants without being convinced that they have a means of communication known only to themselves. I have provided an ant with food too large to be carried off, when it would return to its home and soon appear with two others, and the trio would remove it. Did not the ant tell its good fortune and ask for aid? Ants are often seen facing each other in close proximity and touching one another with their antennæ, presumably exchanging ideas.

Much attention has been given of late to the language of monkeys. It does not require a trip to Africa to demonstrate the fact, and it is doubtful if a monkey would deliberately walk up to a cage and utter sounds.

Almost every tribe has sounds peculiar to itself, often accompanied with facial contortions, and that they have some significance goes without question. The elephant has an interesting series of sounds or noises, which it utters on various occasions, and which undoubtedly constitute its language. I was impressed with this when attending a private view of Jumbo, given to a number of professional men in New York, when the keeper made the huge animal exercise his voice. A shrill cry, uttered through the trunk, indicated rage. An elephant has been heard to warn another elephant by a low sound resembling prut, or a gentle twittering, while wild elephants utter a sound like hammering on a cask. When the keeper prodded Jumbo, or touched him with the goad, the great beast uttered a penetrating squeak, which seemed to be made inside of the trunk and was ear-piercing. He showed his pleasure by low purring like a cat, the sound being audible to the driver alone. Rage was expressed by a rumbling in the throat, and fear by a verberating roar. Suspicion is often shown among wild elephants by a tapping upon the ground, and there are various other sounds and signals which show that the elephant has a language of its own.

Certain shells utter singular sounds, accidental, perhaps, but in some instances so sharp that they attracted widespread attention. Some travelers were passing from the promontory of Salsette to Sewree, in Bombay, when they were amazed at hearing a long protracted booming sound like the notes of a gigantic harp, or a pitch-pipe. At first it was believed to come from the shore, and some of the party were convinced that some one was playing upon a musical instrument; but stopping the boat they found that it was coming from all around them, and was supposed to proceed from a little shell common in the vicinity.

It may be assumed that all animals have a language of sound, sign or odor that serves them as well as perfect vocal language of man.—Charles Frederick Holder, in Mail and Express.

DRILL INTEGRITY INTO BOYS.

I have a wide-awake boy of twelve years and it is the sincerest wish of my heart to have him attain a good, honest and useful manhood. There are so many snares and temptations in the way. Business men say that it is hard to find boys who can be trusted with the handling of money. They cannot withstand temptation and nowadays, owing to various causes, temptations are stronger than formerly. Nine-tenths of the office and errand boys of to-day are holding positions of trust made so by the necessities of business, and they are the children mostly of men whose stations in life have not shown them the necessity of inculcating in their boys the principles of business integrity. The boys themselves, unused to the luxury of spending money, charmed by its fascinations, induced by older companions, sometimes are led to petty thieving. The iesire to spend is natural enough and but few boys are philosophical enough not to say morally strong enough, either by nature or training, to withstand the temptation of availing themselves of the opportunities to steal small sums. Their home training has not made them strong and honest. Is not the existence of this evil suggestive to parents who expect their children to enter the lowest place of mercantile life? Is it not suggestive to parents who are lavish of their money with their boys? Suggestive also to the business men who are, and who are to be, dependent on help of this kind? It is not enough that a boy "takes to" a business life; as in any other science, he should be instructed, and this instructor should be his employer, and his employer should be qualified to instruct. Should not the elements of business, and not the least among them is integrity, be taught him thoroughly at home?—Aunt Patience.

Bluffkins wandered in at the club the other night and drew his chair close to the fire.

"I wouldn't be an Englishman for anything!" he ejaculated. "They have the most gluttonous appetites on record."

"You cawn't prove that, by Jove!" said Mr. Algernon Hawkins, who lived on chops and swore by her Majesty.

"I can," replied Bluffkins, with unruffled composure, "and here is the proof. I was riding home in an electric last night. Two Englshmen sat next to me. 'I 'ave just bought a stove,' said one. 'So 'ave I,' said the other. 'But mine is the best on earth; it cooks my breakfast in 'alf an hour,' said the first. 'Jove!' said the second, 'that isn't anything. I can 'eat my stove in five minutes.'"

And even Mr. Algernon Hawkins acknowledged that the Englishman did have a pretty solid appetite.—Boston Budget.

FAIR TO THE LABORERS.

In the city of Boston all laborers seeking employment from the city register their names and are employed in the order of their application. The justice of this system to all who seek work from the city has taken so firm a hold on the working people that any suspicion of favoritism is immediately investigated, and no public officer would dare to depart from the system or propose its abandonment. If a like plan were put in force in this city, as it can be under existing law by Mayor Strong, one of the chief sources of the strength of Tammany or of partisan corruption of any sort would be completely done away with.—New York Times.

It is rumored at Brazil, Ind., that a band of vagrants fed the body of a child that had died from among them to the bears they had with them. Farmers, armed with shotguns, drove the tramps out of Putnam county.

MEN'S COSTUMES.

Supposed to be More Rational Than Women's.

WEAR AS FEW CLOTHES AS POSSIBLE

The Worst Point in Man's Dressing is in its Covering of the Ankle—Beauty Concealed.

Man has falllen into the black pit. Like all pits made by saveges it is easy to get into and hard to get out of. Any attempt would make him seem ridiculous, so he will not try.

The continual wearing of black in dress makes the taste negative, and dulls the sense for color. The continual wearing of conventional clothes makes art and beauty seem eccentric and therefore ridiculous. The continual wearing of things made by a tailor kills originality. The continual covering of the body with hideous things makes the body become hideous. Stunting the body also dwarfs the mind, and makes it grow dull and commonplace.

The worst of it is woman wants to fall into the pit after him. She mistakes his fall for a flight. She confounds the sandals of Mercury, the wings ouf Icarus, and the pants of Jonathan.

Man's dress is supposed to be more rational than woman's. This is not so. It is simply more ugly. Some people say that absence of beauty indicates good sense. The clothes of man give neither freedom, comfort nor beauty. Above all they retard his personal growth.

Opinions differ as to the origin of the fall—as to when the idea originated, that to be manly man must be hideous. Some say it was the reaction from the Greek and Roman worship of material beauty; that the saints of the early church rushed from the glorification to the mortification of the body.

The world knows constantly such swinging of the pendlum. The Romans made a public cult of bathing; the good people of the dark ages did not bathe at all. This disdain of matter laid the root of the present ignorant and careless value of art.

The wearing of armor began to divide the body into parts—dress in early times being designed as a whole—a flowing garment to be bound with a girdle, a cloak to be thrown over the shoulders. But man in armor became a thing of parts ana pieces. He was no longer a man. That splendid unity of line which makes his figure superior even to that of woman, the sweep from chest to foot, from shoulder to flank, was lost never to be seen again. For the maker of each little piece became so proud that each little piece became an individual trade, each different in design without thought of the rest, and unity was lost. Man had to fight and work; he was only a machine of hinges, and joints, and could not be recognized even by his own servants; so the fantastic designs of heraldry were invented to mark him to his own.

These little pieces for arms and legs were the beginnings of pants, shirts, vests, stockings, gloves and all modern abominations.

The Reign of Terror struck the last blow to the reign of beauty. Before that time there was a distinction between those that gave power and wisdom and glory and art to the world and those that spun and labored that they might live. In return the rich gave the poor an endless spectacle of beauty, a climax to national glory, an encouragemet to the glorious arts. Both men and women lived surrounded by beauty and all the arts became personal and intense.

But when these exceeded their privileges the bleeding swords fell and the whole world was in fear at the power of the people, and the rich began to wear citizens' clothes and at least to pretend that they were workmen. As a concession to the commercial ascendency crowns were put on museum shelves and queens took to wearing rusty black bonnets. "Don't kill us," they said; "we are the same as you; do we not dress alike, are not our clothes as ugly as yours? Does not this speak of our simple hearts?"

Many are the opinions as to the origin of modern dress, there is only one opinion as to its hideousness.

There have been many periods of manly dignity and beauty in vesture without the foolishness of lace and ruffles and feathers, which seem to arise to mind the moment any change is thought of. The German burgher, Venetian senator or Elizabethan courtier give to the eye pictures of men in full nobility and power, yet with beauty of color, line and texture, that but adds to the strength of their personality.

How hard it is to make a great man of to-day look great, men only know when they try to make his statue.

He should be heard and not seen.

In a talk with the painter of "Love and Life" and "Love and Death" he said: "The worst point in man's dressing is in its covering of the ankle—man's superb poise comes from its lightness of relation with the natural universe, his legs are more beautiful in structure than his arms, and we make them like sawed off posts."

Frederick Shield's point of attack was the hat—the beauty of the head should be supreme, but at present is destroyed by a monstrosity of no possible relation to its lines of composition. If the modern hat were found in a desert island the wildest conjecture would fail to discover its intention and use.

Walter Crane said, "social condition," Commercial success makes all men wear business clothes, and as long as the capitalist is in power his tastes must remain the standard for all men.

With all this known, and few men care for the origin of things and fewer for any deviation from custom, there is still a general idea that, after all, man's dress is very sensible and practical and comfortable.

This comes from contrasting man's stupidity with woman's foolishness.

The truth is while one is ignorance concealed by beauty, the other is ignorance concealed by ugliness.

The pretty mass of color and fluffiness that comes into the street car and fills it with radiance of hair and flesh and face powder is so intangible, fascinating and beyond all analysis that it seems necessary to give up science, art and religion and look upon it as merely woman, and all ideas of how a woman should look vanish in the charming reality of how a woman does look.

And the young man, who inherited his father's fortune with his father's dyspepsia, in his toothpick shoes, trouser creases and narrow chest, high collar, cane and monocle is so hopelessly inhuman that men give it up and look upon it as simply man, without daring to think of past or future.

The artist enjoys a little wider personal taste, both from inclination and permission, and people often mistake individual delight or caprice for a step in radical change, but they have as little influence as the painter in New York who fastens back his long black hair with a diamond ornament. A thumb-ring or a bowetie is often hailed as the beginning of a revolution—these are of slight importance, except in the form of pleasure they give their wearer, and should be always permitted and encouraged—especially in the house. But it is in structural points that radical change must come, and this will only be when instructors waken to the need of a higher knowledge of the body than is taught in the modern circus gymnasiums.

A graduate of Harvard knows no more about dressing than a discharged inmate from Blackwell's Island.

A few structural points may be considered that can be easily studied and remembered and bear vital relation to growth.

The first is the carriage of the chest—it is the central point of development and no clothes give enough room for its expansion. The line of poise should tip forward and not backward, and the chest be kept constantly held to its fullest expansion; men breathe with the abdominal muscles, not with the ribs. The abdominal prominence which is almost universal is the result of carelessness. The sunken chest reduces the abdominal cavity nearly one-half.

Most men wear the coat three or four inches too small across the chest.

The tailor grabs and pulls the coat together till the poor, frightened man sinks to his lowest breath and is fitted to it. Naturally he makes no more breathing effort than his coat allows him and the next time he covers in a little more, the chest falls, the gold watch chain on the abdomen shines with greater prominence and some time far ahead they say he died from overwork.

If the chest is lifted to its greatest height the tailor will say, "No gentleman stands like that," or, "That poise is good, but you cannot keep up to it." Never mind; you can grow up to it, and next time it will need still more room if you give the lungs a chance. A new life is drawn in with the new expansion, and in a year's time what was unnatural will become normal and you are beginning to live in personal control. A man cannot attain the growth of his nature, mental or physical, in wearing clothes four inches too small for him.

It is best to leave pockets out of the coat as when filled with papers, check books, etc., their unequal pressure has a tendency to discourage the poise. The same of the vest. Pressure answers pressure, and if four buttons press on the stomach and none on the chest the stomach will press out and the chest will fall. With all sack, summer and Prince Albert coats the poise will be greatly improved if the vest is not worn.

If you have a good figure, wear as few clothes as possible. Pressure will destroy both its natural lines and its union as a whole.

If you have work to do in the worl l wear as few clothes as possible. Pressure weakens nerve force and wastes personal power.

The well-poised chest should bring the full weight on the ball of the advanced foot, and a line dropped from it should just touch the front of the toe. This also gives the correct poise of the head, which takes its expression from the activity of the chest.

Having this strength at the center and control of the body line, another youth can be attained by resting the extremities in every way. They do the nervous work, while the center holds the controlling force.

Head, hands, and feet, through their connecting joints of neck, wrist and ankle, should be free from motion and action, and each year should be trained to higher motion and action. The neck is the bridge between head and torso, most complex in structure, and most important in growth. Its freedom is absolutely necessary to expression.

This knocks out the high collar.

Aside from all facts of beauty the collar in front should never come above the point where the head and neck join. In the back it can be higher, as the pressure is supported by the bony structure.

The hand should never be stifled by a glove; it is a most nervous and susceptible structure, and needs all the freedom possible. Gloves make wrinkles in the face and exhaust vitality.

The shoe should never touch the ankle, and all lacings and buttonings should be avoided. Much fatige can be avoided by keeping the foot supple and active. Even the underclothes should be loose and never of the nature of tights, as all pressure wastes force.

After the attention to these points of structure and growth, good taste in simple grays and browns, neatness of line and the beauty of a few jewels is all the art allowed to man.—Edmund Russell, Mail and Express.

The Vienna People's Kitchen.

As a general rule, the cost of any given article depends on the quantities in which it is manufactured, and to this rule cooked food is no exception. The smaller the scale on which the business of a restaurant is conducted the higher must be the keeper's charges if he is to extract a living out of it for himself. Where much larger quantities of food are cooked at the same time, the cost of their preparation becomes diminished to a mere fraction of that of the raw material, and charges can be lessened accordingly.

The success which has attended an experiment of this kind is notably instanced by the "volkskuchen," or "people's kitchens," which have been established in Vienna. It shows the exceedingly low prices at which food can be supplied where the demand is large and steady, and thus furnishes us with a basis for practical calculations.

At the "people's kitchens" no fewer than from 40,000 to 60,000 meals, ample and excellent, are prepared daily. The price of a dinner consisting of soup, meat, bread, vegetables, pudding and coffee, with fruit or cheese, is about 3½ pence in English money. A breakfast of coffee, vegetable soup, bread, ham and eggs may be had for 2 pence. A supper of cold meat, bread, vegetables and pudding, with tea or coffee, costs 2½ pence. The large consumption of food, which allows it to be bought in cheap markets, is of course one of the causes enabling the establishments to maintain such low prices. A more important cause is to be found in the perfection of their organization and management.—National Review.

The Feat of an Episcopalian Bishop.

It may safely be asserted that not one of his episcopal brethren has ever performed such a feat as formed an episode in the early life of the bishop of Norwich. After serving a couple of years as curate under Dr. Hook at Leeds, Mr. Sheepshanks went out to British Columbia in 1859, when that colony was a far wilder and more isolated country than now. He did eight years of rough work, and then determined to come home for a holiday at all events, electing to travel via Japan and China, in those days a by no means familiar route. For months he disappeared entirely from mortal ken, and his family began to entertain serious misgivings as to his fate.

One evening a young Cambridge man, afterward head master of a well known grammar school, but tutor for the nonce to a Russian prince, was smoking a cigarette in his rooms in St. Petersburg when his servant announced that a moujik wanted to see him very urgently. The unknown visitor was shown up and appeared in the well worn garb from which Brian O'Lynn derived his simple but practical sartorial notions. To his host's utter bewilderment this uncouth being addressed him in refined English and presently explained that he was a brother Cantab desirous of securing his good offices. The man, in short, was the Rev. John Sheepshanks, who, having landed some six months before near the mouth of the Amoor river, had made his way alone and on foot through Tartary, Toorkistan and Siberia to the banks of the Neva.—St. James Gazette.

Right of Way For Funerals.

"The superstitious think it's bad luck to cross a funeral," said a man, "but it would by no means do to assume that every person who waits for a funeral to pass is superstitious. There are plenty of persons who half out of respect for the dead, and there are some who seem to consider that the dead and the mourners are entitled to something more than respect—that the funeral has the right of way. It was such a feeling as this, no doubt, and not superstition, that prompted the action of a gripman that I rode down town with the other day on a Broadway car. At Canal street we met a funeral going east. At the rate at which we were moving we would just about have met a carriage about midway in the procession.

"Of course the gripman could easily have held his way. He could have pounded his gong, and no doubt the driver of the carriage would have held up. As a matter of fact, the driver had already begun to pull up, expecting that the gripman would demand the right to go first. But the gripman's gong was silent. Instead, swinging round slowly but surely on the brake wheel, he nodded at the same time to the left, indicating to the driver that he should go first, which he did, moving with a little added celerity as he went, as an acknowledgment of the gripman's courtesy. As there was room before the next carriage, the gripman sounded his gong, released the brake wheel, let on the grip and went on. He had, so far as was consistent with his duties to the living, rendered due homage to the dead."—New York Sun.

The Work He Does.

How much does a newspaper man write in a year? An old newspaper worker has sat down and figured it out. He figures that he writes an average of a 1½ columns every day, except for his Sunday paper, when he contributes three columns. This makes 12 columns in a week, and, allowing for two weeks' vacation, he has 50 weeks in a year, in which time he turns out 840,000 words. An ordinary book of short stories contains about 40,000 words, therefore his year's labor is equivalent to 20 books. At this rate of comparison the feat of Marion Crawford in publishing two books per annum does not strike the newspaper men as an incredibly hard task, even allowing for the extra amount of thought involved in story writing. Mr. Howells considers a thousand words a good day's work. Thomas Janvier is satisfied with 400 words, or a little over a quarter of a column.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

Artists' Opinions of Women's Forms.

William M. Chase says that while in the old days women's forms were the most beautiful those of the men are finer in this century. That is because the women sit in the house and gather fat and then try to make people believe them lean by pinching their waists out of shape and cramping their feet. Carroll Beckwith also holds that the most perfect types are found among the men, but holds that the feminine approaches its best type more frequently than the masculine.—Buffalo News.

MY LOVE.

Too warm for the lily,
Too pure for the rose—
O Muse, I invoke thee,
Some fit name discloses.

Shall I call her my violet,
Dewey and sweet?
But, nay—she's too stately—
The name is not meet.

Shall I call her my heartease,
Who gives my heart pain,
With her eyes like the pansies
That ope after rain?

Not all the flower kingdom
Has a fit name—but yet—
Hold! I have found it—
She's my mignonette!

CORRECT EVENING DRESS.

The Various Articles That Make Up the Costume of a Well Dressed Man.

To begin with, evening dress should never be worn before 6 o'clock; in these days when people dine so late it is seldom worn as early. Ordinarily at home a man may wear a black sack coat with silk collar, waistcoat and trousers to match. With this coat, which is called a "dinner" coat, should always be worn a black cravat—not made up, but tied by the wearer in a simple bowknot. This style of costume is suitable only for most informal dinners at home, or in summer at the houses of one's intimate friends.

With what is usually called a dress coat (swallow tail) should be worn always, except when in mourning, a white lawn cravat tied in a bowknot. This may be starched or not, as the wearer prefers, but is somewhat trimmer looking if starched. With this coat a black waistcoat may be worn. It should be single breasted, with black buttons. In case a white waistcoat is preferred (it is usually considered more dressy) it should be made of pique or some similar fabric that can be washed. It should be single breasted, with buttons covered with the material or else plain pearl buttons.

Apropos of buttons, it is well always to avoid anything conspicuous, no matter how costly. Plain pearl buttons may be worn in the front of the shirt or plain gold studs, or even silver. Oriental pearls are often worn. These, if not too large, are to be preferred. Even though a man is in mourning he should wear evening dress. He may wear the dinner coat, etc., as described above, or the swallowtail, with a black silk (not satin) cravat.

White waistcoats should not be worn with black cravats nor with dinner coats, neither should a man in mourning wear satin facings and satin cravat. Plain black silk is best. A very prominent part of evening dress is the footgear. Plain black silk hose with patent leather pumps are best. Some men prefer low shoes. In this case they should be made without toe caps. A great many young men wear elaborate embroidered hose, but this class is also apt to wear jeweled studs, rings, etc.

It is the man in the perfectly laundered, well fitting plain linen shirt, white starched cravat, plain studs, well brushed and pressed clothes, plain black silk stockings and pumps who makes the best appearance. And the man in the embroidered or tucked shirt front fastened with jeweled studs, watered silk facings, white silk waistcoat, gold buttons, gorgeously embroidered hose, is not "in it."—Vogue.

The Physician and the Patient.

The physician was young; so was the patient. The case was strange. None of the symptoms corresponded with any known disease. The physician was perplexed. He came every day. The patient grew worse. Nothing seemed of the least use. Presently the physician began to suspect something. The trouble was mental perhaps—of the heart perhaps. He watched and waited. His suspicions grew stronger. At last he charged the patient with the thing. "I believe," he said, "that there is nothing in the world the matter with you, but that you are in love." With blushes and tears the patient confessed that this and nothing else was devouring her, so that she was growing worse and worse daily.

"And does the man know?" "Alas!" she replied, "he does not even suspect." "Can you tell him?" "Never." "Will you tell me, then? I might at least advise." She hung her head and hesitated. "Come," he said, with kindly encouragement, "tell me all; make a clean breast of it. It will do you no harm and may do you good. Besides, a physician is a father confessor." "Since you have asked me," she replied, with some confusion, "come tomorrow. Then perhaps—if I can—I will tell you." On the morrow he arrived. The patient placed in his hand a slip of paper and left him hurriedly. He opened the paper and read—"II Samuel xii,7." This text you may look up unless you know the story already.—Walter Besant in London Queen.

Street Cleaning In Paris.

Some interesting facts have just been published about street cleaning in Paris. The annual cost is $1,750,000. The service is divided into four sections—the purchase and care of the material; the administration of the cantonniers; the watering of the streets; the removal of the mud, stone and garbage. The total surface which has to be swept daily is about 15,500,000 square yards, of which about 9,000,000 is paid for by house owners with the sweeping tax.

The remainder is paid for from the city funds. The street sweepers are spread over Paris in 149 ateliers, each of which consists of a staff of 20 or 25 men and women under the command of a chef and a chef adjoint. The total staff of regulars is 3,200. Work commences at 4 o'clock in the morning and is completed at the same hour in the afternoon. Among the disinfectants used and liberally applied every morning are sulphate of iron, phenic acid and chloride of lime.—New York Advertiser.

The Dressing of Children.

There is a constant temptation to dress children in the fantastic garb which suits their style and adds piquancy to their beauty. Mothers should pause to reflect, however, that one of two things must happen—either the little one is morbidly sensitive and resents the conspicuous attire or it is inordinately vain and enjoys it. Either is unwholesome and dangerous. Probably these reflections account for the extreme to which many parents have gone in a reaction from the Fauntleroy and Christmas card styles. A private park in a fashionable quarter will show nowadays amid the many groups of children that the majority are simply and sensibly dressed, and only a very small minority attract attention by any eccentricity of garb. Indeed when it comes, as it has, to dropping a Dutch cap with flaring wings upon a little girl's head and an Oxford cap upon her brother's, common sense suggests that it is time to halt.—Philadelphia Press.

There are no new developments in connection with the projeced San Joaquin Valley railroad. The subscription is now considerably in excess of the required two millions, and is still growing steadily. Mr. Spreckels insists that it shall be made six millions, and has offered to double his own subscription when by so doing the sum will reach this figure. Interest now centers in the route to be followed. San Jose wants the road to come through the Santa Clara Valley and to cross into the San Joaquin further south; and intimates to secure the adoption of this route a very handsome subscription will be made to the capital stock. This scheme would make the terminus on the San Francisco peninsula, leaving out Oakland and the lower end of the San Joaquin valley. Stockton is much exercised ever the matter and proposes by liberal subscription to the project to have a say in arranging the route. Oakland is expected to pursue the same policy. The result, possibly, will be the construction of a road with two approaches to the city, one via Stockton and Oakland and the other through the Santa Clara valley and up the peninsula. The feeling grows, though upon what basis we cannot learn, that Mr. Spreckles knows more than he is willing to tell and that he is in fact, working in conjunction with the Santa Fe people whose road now reaches the southern part of the State. This assumption adds, of course, to the popularity of the project. If there be, in fact, an understanding between Spreckles and the Santa Fe, it means not only a local line thorough the San Joaquin valley, but immediate Eastern connection. Such a connection is bound to be made sooner or later. As yet, the Valley road has not been incorporoted, but attorneys are at work preparing the papers and it will not be a great while before operations will be actually under way.

Mr. Hudson's Assembly bill provides that the Supervisors shall submit to the vote of the people the question of bonded indebtedness for road purposes when ever a majority of the residents of a district affected petition for such submission. Good in principle, that. But we are not clear as to the wisdom of confining it to road districts. Suppose the people of the whole county are effected, or desire to be, why not let them have power to compel the Supervisors to submit the question to them, and that, too, without a petition of a majority of the residents of the county? Far more often will counties wish to issue bonds than will districts. At any rate, make it obligatory on Supervisors to submit such questions on petition of a strength fairly representative. Then, too, it seems to us that taxpayers only should be petitioners, not mere residents.

It is now said that the Republican boss of Sacramento is about to institute impeachment proceedings against Secretary of the State Brown, moved thereto by disappointment at not receiving for some of his creatures places in the Secretary of the State's office that he alleges Brown promised him early in the campaign. Rhodes is taking his troubles before the Sacramento Grand Jury. It is said that Brown promised Rhodes seven places in and about the Capitol building, that are at the disposal of the Secretary of State. But the chances are that Brown will not be impeached.

The Democrats in the house are hopelessly divided on the currency question. Tom Reed voted for the administration bill last Friday which is an indication that the Republican majority in the next house will pass some measure substantially like the bill recommended by the President.

Communism—there really is no other name for the thing—is growing rapidly in San Francisco. It is taking the form of government by inflammatory declaration at mass meetings, which are worked by parties whose chief end is the promotion of tumult that the greed for sensationalism may be gratified.

OUR WINES AGAINST THE WORLD.

California Will Have a Full Exhibit at the Bordeaux Exposition.

The viticultural commissioners have decided to make an exhibit of California wines and brandies at the exposition which is to be held at Bordeaux from the 1st of May next until the 1st of November.

Secretary Scott received a cable dispatch last week from Bordeaux to the effect that the Societe Philomathique has accepted the terms offered by the viticultural commission, and that California wines and brandies will be accorded a full and complete representation at the forthcoming exhibition.

This is the first opportunity which has ever been accorded local wine growers and distillers to display their products in Bordeaux. During the last two years substantial recognition has been accorded California wines and brandies in various European centers. Gold medals have been awarded at the expositions in Genoa in 1892, in Dublin in 1892, in Antwerp in 1893 and in Lyons in 1894, but the California wine and brandy makers have never before had an opportunity of showing their best products to the winemakers of the world in the center of the greatest claret market in the world—Bordeaux.

Secretary Scott of the viticultural commission said:

"California wines have already received splendid recognition from foreign experts. We intend to carry the battle right into the heart of the finest producing district of clarets in the world. Five years ago an effort to convince the bottlers of French wine that we had wines worthy of their recognition might have been hopeless. There are, however, in this state 100 or more men who have in view the production of the very highest types of wine, whether these types be of claret, Burgundy, Rhine wines or any other kind. These people know that we have an area of country suitable for winemaking as large and as varied as all of the countries of Europe outside of Russia.

"We want to put samples of all of our wines before the countries of the world, and we have never before had such an opportunity as is now presented in the Bordeaux exposition. We do not claim that we have the very best of everything, but we do want to show to all comers that we have at least as good wine as can be shown by any country. All that we ask is an equal and fair chance with any country, and I think it is fortunate for the state that the means exist for inviting such a comparison without any undue expense to the individual winemakers. The commission intends to collect all of the samples. The samples will be sent on, and due care will be taken that fair play is done to all concerned. All that we are waiting for is for complete particulars as to the expense."—San Francisco Chronicle.

BY RAIL TO THE YOSEMITE.

Five Hours by Electric Road In Place of Four Days by Stage.

Chicago capitalists, in conjunction with others in New York and California, may undertake an improvement in the Golden State in the shape of an electric road which will involve an expenditure of $2,500,000. The projected road is to run from Merced, in the San Joaquin valley. As planned it is to continue from that town into the heart of the Yosemite valley, a distance of 100 miles. A. F. Hatch, one of the Chicago men interested, said recently that few things in connection with the project were definitely settled except the plan in a general way.

"The purpose," he said, "is to furnish modern transportation facilities into the Yosemite. At present visitors leave the railroad either at Merced or Raymond and travel by stage into the valley. It is a four days' journey for the round trip and a laborious mountain climb for animals, although the same distance could be traversed under some conditions in a few hours. Despite the discomforts of the trip, many people visit the region. By an electric road the journey will be reduced to a five hours' ride in a comfortable car. It is proposed to equip the road for freight traffic in connection with passenger business. I know the carrying of freight by an electric road is an experiment, but it has been done, and we think it can be accomplished regularly, successfully and profitably."—Chicago Tribune.

Their Credentials.

The principal of a certain ladies' college in Cambridge advertised for a porter, asking the candidates to apply by letter. One correspondent began with "My dear sir," and ended with "Love to all the family."

Another, after stating his many qualifications, made the following admission: "I am a married man, but a Christian," and at the foot of his letter put, "P. S.—Strick T. T."

A third, a woman, wrote in favor of her husband, saying he was specially well qualified to be a janitor in a school "because he had a sister who was married to a gentleman whose father had been a teacher."—London Tit-Bits.

An Eighteen Ton Bell.

One result of the French-Russian fetes was the movement at St. Petersburg to provide Notre Dame, Paris, with a big bell made in Russia. The architects have discovered that the edifice cannot support the weight of the proposed bell, and an arrangement has been made between the Russian committee and Cardinal Richard that the bell shall be placed in the Church of the Sacred Heart. The gift, which is nearly finished, weighs 18 tons. It will be called "La Cloche de la Paix." In a few weeks it will be transported from St. Petersburg to Odessa in a Russian vessel and taken to Marseilles, thence overland to Paris.—Paris Letter.

Peter's Pence Dwindling.

A few years ago the Peter's pence from France averaged 3,000,000 francs. In 1893 the sum was 1,800,000 francs, and last year it fell below 1,000,000.

PLANTS SET BY MACHINERY.

The Transplanter Has Come to Stay and Ends Another Hand Job.

There remains not a doubt about the successful operation of machines for setting out plants like cabbage, tobacco, tomato and all similar growths. These transplanters are adapted to field work and require a team, driver and two droppers, besides some help to pull the plants, writes a tobacco grower who has tried one to Rural New Yorker. He says: The transplanter is coming into general use among the tobacco growers. A grower that raises two acres thinks he can afford to buy one.

The reason why a small grower likes to own a machine is that he can set his plants whenever they are ready. The practice is to transplant afternoons in very hot weather, but in cloudy, cool weather it doesn't make much difference. Some experts claim that they have set four acres a day, but two acres or perhaps 2½ acres set 3 feet one way and 18 inches the other seem to be enough for the droppers. This would require 18,000 to 20,000 plants. The transplanter has an attachment that calls for the plants at the distance required, but the droppers need considerable experience to obey it at the particular time.

The farmer quoted planted two acres of potatoes with his machine in drills eight inches apart. It took about eight hours. Ordinarily every plant will live. The exceptions are when there is a depression in the ground, such as a dead furrow or a stone, sod or similar obstruction. There is a water tank to every transplanter. He runs a continuous stream and has had tobacco plants live that lay on the ground with scarcely any earth on the roots. He says that with good droppers tobacco plants will live better during an ordinary season than plants set by hands after a rain. Most farmers who own transplanters get their plants ready in the forenoon and set them in the afternoon, which makes a great difference in the plants living. The ground ought to be well prepared and rolled to do first rate work. In planting potatoes take off the tank and put a box in its place in which to carry the seed. Two good droppers can drop as fast, 10 or 18 inches apart, as an ordinary team will walk. In setting tobacco, etc, a slow walking pair of horses are the best.

These transplanters will also handle strawberries quickly and with satisfactory results.

Cut Fodder For Stock.

Professor Plumb of the Indiana station tells that they prefer to feed cut fodder, whether hay or corn. The most economical and satisfactory ration when fodder is scarce he has found to be a mixture of practically one part each of cornstalks, oat straw and clover hay. Everything was eaten reasonably clean, and the cows never went through the winter in better shape. He says:

As we could buy oat straw for from $3 to $4 per ton, and no cornstalks were in the market, and clover and timothy mixed were away up in price, the oat straw brought down the general cost and at the same time furnished in itself a fairly nutritious rough food. We cannot lay too much stress on the value we set on corn fodder, either dry, green or as ensilage. We keep feeding it nearly the whole year round. I believe no fodder gives better influence on the quality of butter than well cured corn stover. In the winter we feed in the manger and not, as a rule, in pasture. While our fodder corn is run through a cutting machine, where well cured, I believe that shredded fodder may be fed more economically, as there are no hard butt pieces left in the mangers.

A Good Word For the Mule.

It is the popular belief that a mule is very stupid as compared with the horse, but Professor Schaler writes as follows in Scribner's: I have never found a person who was well acquainted with both animals who hesitated to place the mongrel in the intellectual grade above the pure blooded animal. There is, it is true, a decided difference in the mental qualities of the two creatures. The mule is relatively undemonstrative, his emotions being sufficiently expressed by an occasional bray, a mode of utterance which he has inherited from the humbler side of his house in a singularly unchanged way. Even in the best humor he appears sullen and lacks those playful capers which give such expression to the well bred horse, particularly in its youthful state.

It is evident, however, that it discriminates men and things more clearly than does the horse. In going over difficult ground it studies its surface and picks it way so as to secure a footing in an almost infallible manner. Even when loaded with a pack it will consider the encumbrance and not so often try to pass where the burden will become entangled with fixed objects.

Stray Items And Local Happenings From The Lower End Of Inyo.

Editor Inyo Independent:—Herewith find a few items gleaned from vearious sources personal, mining and otherwise.

Miss Campbell of Darwin went to Lone Pine Thursday morning for medical treatment, she has been sick with La grip for the past three or four days.

Mr. Charles Anthony of the same place was also a passenger on Thursday's train bound for San Francisco, on business connected with his mine and store.

Mr. W. S. Shee of Santa Monica, was a passenger on the last train for Alvord. Mr. Schee is now the owner of the extension of the Lane mine, which has changed hands quite rapidly in the last three weeks, it was sold to a Mr. R. A. Hall of Riverside about a month ago by Supervisor J. Wilson, for some figure near 500 dollars, and in turn was sold by Mr. Hall to Mr. Schee for a figure some where up in the thousands, Mr. Schee has to or three men at work sinking on the Ledge now and is down a depth of 25 feet, and rumor has it that he has struck a bonanza, it being reported that he refused ten thousand dollars for it yesterday.

The Mojave stage line continues to do a very good passenger business, arrivals and departures average three or four each trip, among the departures on Thursdays stage was D. C. Lane who left for Pomona on a visit. Mr. Lane says his mine is looking first class, and he expects to have a new shaft sunk about three hundred feet inside of the next three months, and will then resume taking out ore again.

Mr. J. J. Morton went out to his mine Thursday, and will open up extensively and possibly make a shipment of ore to test.

Mr. E. C. Garlick, Supt. of the Argus group of mines, has concluded all the arrangements for water and mill sites and has gone out to Snows Canyon with a supply of provisions and tools.

Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Walters of Sunny side ranch near Fort Independence visited Keeler for the first time since they have resided in Owens Valley, and were the guests of Mrs. W. M. Richards, on Monday and Tuesday. Mr. Walters was agreeably surprised at the appearance of the town and says it will compare favorably with any of the rest of the towns in the valley.

Mr. Charles Demetris formerly waiter at Bolands Hotel has gone to Los Angeles or Fresno, to engage in the barber business; he left on Tuesdays stage for Mojave.

Mrs. A. L. Boland of Keeler, it is said will soon move to Lone Pine, and contemplates opening a dressmaking store at that place.

Miss Mattie Johnson of Lone Pine is visiting with friends in Keeler.

Eleven cars of soda and three cars of ore were shipped north from Keeler last week and fully as many will be shipped this coming week if all reports are true.

Mr. La Forester Batcheldor is among the latest arrivals in Keeler and is at present clerking for Mr. Boland in the store.

J. G. Dodge of Lone Pine has been hauling supplies from Keeler for the past three days to Mr P. Clinton at Cerro Gordo, who is making preparations to take out ore from the Newtown mine which he has leased from Hawley & Co.

Mr. C. Rulinson the boss carpenter who has been in charge of all the carpenter work at both the upper and lower soda works for the past few months, has about completed his work and will then return to his home in Reno. Mr. Rulinson is an enthusiastic chess player, and many a pleasant game has he played with Agent Richards at the Railroad station.

It is said to be a nightly occurance to see and hear drunken Indians and squaws in and around Lone Pine and Keeler, where it is becoming a very great nuisance. The guilty parties are spotted and it will only be a matter of a short time until Mr. Givens reward of 25 dollars will be earned by some one. The officers of the law should look into this matter at once before there is any serious trouble.

The above few hastily picked up items will have to do for the present, with a promise to send more next time.

Au revoir,
BILL NIGH JR.

Mining Matters.

The following is taken from the Fresno Republican of January 25th.

Editor Republican:—Having promised a number of friends in Fresno county to write to them in regard to this section of country and particularly its mining prospects, I would respectfully ask an insertion of a few lines in your valuable paper. Placer gold was discovered here in paying quantities probably twenty years ago, but at that time the miners, where they could not obtain water had to haul or pack their dirt, but now as the dry washer has proved a success a new era has dawned upon mining. Diggings are now being worked that never could have been worked under any other process. Gold was discovered last May in Mazourka canyon by some Mexicans and about thirty men have been engaged in mining there ever since. This discovery led to others, and now there are a number of places where gold has been found in paying quantities. This gold is found in the Inyo range of mountains, although not very rich or very extensive, yet in the aggregate, a considerable quantity has been taken out and from present indications more will be taken out the coming season than there was last. The season for dry washing will commence in May and last until the first rains in the fall, probably November, when it must cease, as the ground gets to wet to be worked by that process. General mining is very quiet now, and I hear of no new discoveries. There is nothing doing in silver owing to the demonetization of that metal, although there are said to be some good ledges in this county. Only give us free coinage and Inyo will come to the front as one of the best mining counties in the State. While I cannot advise any one to come here, I will say that it is a good climate, free from malaria and as healthy as any in the world. The soil is good, and the water pure and unexcelled. What this country most needs is a pood system of irrigation and then it would sustain a large population and blossom as the rose. But above all, do not come without money, as living is high and work very scarce. One D. R. Roberts, who was in Fresno last summer soliciting aid to develop mines in this section, will doubtless be remembered by many. Should he again visit Fresno with his pocket full of rocks from other people's mines as he did last summer, I would not advise any one to give him money or credit on his representations, as I know by experience that he has no quartz mines over here and never had at any time.

U. S. Gov't Baking Powder Tests.

The report of the analyses of Baking Powders, made by the U. S. Government (Chemical Division, Ag'l Dep't), shows the Royal superior to all other powders, and gives its leavening strength and the strength of each of the other cream of tartar powders tested as follows:

	LEAVENING GAS. Per cent.	Cubic in. per oz.
ROYAL, Absolutely Pure,	13.06	160.6
The OTHER POWDERS TESTED are reported to contain both lime and sulphuric acid, and to be of the following strengths respectively,	12.58	151.1
	10.26	123.2

These tests, made in the Gov't Laboratory, by impartial and unprejudiced official chemists, furnish the highest evidence that the "Royal" is the best baking powder.

CHAPTER III.

GENERAL SHERMAN.

The news that the general gave her was far from reassuring.

"Guess Bill Sherman's a daisy, so he is! Three hundred miles o' marchin' through a country whar there's no roads, and whar the hull place has bin eaten as bare as a apple orchard when there's boys around, ain't as easy as eatin' a biscuit, that's a fact!"

"You bet it ain't—'specially when it's raining like old Harry all the time!"

"And when them rebs air buzzin' around with their cavalry, jist like a swarm o' skeeters! D'ye remember, boys, what a time they gave us 'way down by Tuscumby 'fore we cud drive 'em off?"

"That's so. When the old man got Grant's order to march some fellers said 'twas cl'ar impossible, but I reckon Uncle Billy can't find that word in his dictionary, nohow! Bully for Sherman!"

"Steady, Sam—here comes one o' them hospital ladies. Off with yer caps, boys!"

The "hospital lady" whom these brave fellows saluted with such chivalrous respect was no other than Constance Leigh herself, still searching for her lost lover, and searching in vain.

Since that memorable July night she had passed through many a fearful scene of suffering and death, and had heard from many of her patients strange tales of the man that she sought, whose reckless daring and romantic mystery had made his name familiar to many who had never seen his face. But war and disease had wrought such havoc among the soldiers of Gettysburg that not till that very morning had she met one of the actual comrades of the man whom they knew only as Joe Joliffe, or "Never-die Joe."

Toiling in Chattanooga amid a host of sick and wounded—the wrecks of the fatal field of Chickamauga—she had remarked one face in that ghastly throng which, wan and wasted though it was, had a look of bright, boyish drollery very strange to see amid such a carnival of horrors. It was honest Mike O'Reilly, with a ball through his leg and a fearful saber gash in his shoulder, but still retaining his light hearted Irish jollity so wholly unimpaired by pain and weakness that the amazed surgeon declared that he had "kept death at bay by laughing him out of countenance."

"Faith, it's myself that's in luck to be under shelther," said he cheerily, in reply to her condolences, "for it's the worst of all weather we've been havin' here, glory be to God! Iv it's all like this I'd a dale rather have no weather at all! At daydawn it's as cowld as a landlord's heart, and ye on wid yer coat for the bare life. Thin out comes the sun and melts ye all away, and makes yer clothes cling to yez till ye fale like a pound o' buther rowled up in an ould newspaper; and ye off wid the coat agin, and rowl it up, and on ye thramp. Thin, havin' got yez beyant yer intrenchments, so to spake, down comes the rain on ye like the divil, and wets ye thru and thru to the bone; and whin ye do git to shelther the sun takes a mane advantage of yer absence to come out agin."

"You're a bit of a philosopher, I see, Mr. O'Reilly," said Constance, smiling in spite of herself at the soldier's quaint humor.

"Och, my lady, call me 'Mike,' av ye plaze, and don't be affther sayin' 'Misther O'Reilly.' Sure, it sounds as iv I wor a gintleman, which I'm not, thank God, and niver will be!"

"Why, what a terrible radical you must be, Mike," said the young lady, smiling again.

"Troth, iv ye'd had as much to do wid gintlemen as Oi have, it's yer own swate self 'ud be as radical too. The ownly gintleman I iver knowed that was good for annything was my ould comrade, Joe Joliffe, that we called 'Niver-die Joe.'"

"Do you know him, then?" she asked, trembling with excitement.

"Know him, is it? Faith, didn't he give me his own blanket on a murdherin' cowld night, that froze the very thoughts in my head? and didn't him an' me fight shouldher to shouldher many a day, whin ye cudn't open yer mouth to brathe without dhrawin' in half a dozen bullets? My rear rank man, Bill Slocum, thried to make me belave that the dacent boy was only one o' thim runaway kings from Europe; but I knowed he was too good to belong to any sitch bla'guards. I'll go bail he's 'come o' dacent paple,' like St. Pathrick in the ould song, and niver had a king in his family at all, at all!"

"And where is he now?" asked Constance eagerly.

But that was more than Mike could say. He only knew that Joe had been detached on special duty as a scout, having shown a wonderful aptitude for that kind of work, and where he was now no one could say. He might be in the camp, or he might be a hundred miles away.

Having learned, however, that Joliffe was now acting as a scout, and well-known in that character, Miss Leigh had now something definite to go upon, and after a persistent inquiry—in which she was zealously aided by the surgeons and various officers, who interested themselves warmly in her quest—a man was found who had seen Joe Joliffe making for Sherman's camp on the south side of Chattanooga upon the previous day. Constance at once started in the same direction, accompanied as usual by that model servant, Mr. Dawson, who had followed her as closely as her shadow ever since her departure from New York.

"His late lordship's horders to me, miss," said he with a prim bow, "was to attend you wherever you went, and accordingly it's my dooty to do so."

General Sherman had just come up by a forced march from Bridgeport along the north bank of the Tennessee to Chattanooga, after a fifty days' struggle through mud and rain from Vicksburg via Memphis and Tuscumbia. Sent for in haste to assist in Grant's projected attack upon Bragg's strong lines on Lookout mountain, he had been intrusted with the duty of storming the heights of Missionary Ridge, at the foot of which his men were now encamped.

At such a time the great commander, with his usual untiring energy and wonderful activity, was "everywhere at once," and it was no easy matter to know where to find him; but a young officer to whom Constance addressed herself was able to tell her that the general had spent the whole night in visiting the outposts, and would probably be met with on that side of the camp which faced toward Missionary Ridge.

Under his escort Constance made her way thither, and went to and fro for some time without seeing or hearing anything of the general, when a rough fellow belonging to a picket that had just been relieved pointed to a solitary figure lying asleep on the ground under a tree wrapped in a long cavalry cloak, and said with a coarse laugh:

"See, boys, that's the way we're managed—commanded by drunken officers!"

The rough jest seemed to act like an electric shock upon the sleeper, who awoke at once, rose from the ground to the full height of his towering stature, and throwing back his cloak said quietly:

"I'm not drunk, my friend, only a little sleepy after a week's watching."

The startled jester drew back as if he had trodden on a snake, and slunk off, muttering in a tone of dismay:

"Je-rewsalem! It's Uncle Billy himself!" (A fact.)

Constance Leigh herself was equally amazed, for she had seen too many likenesses of that grand, rugged face, with its massive forehead, iron jaw and deep, earnest eye, not to recognize at a glance the man who was already famous throughout the whole world, though his greatest exploits were still to come—William Tecumseh Sherman. But there was a kindly look in those keen eyes that had looked death in the face so often which at once dissipated her momentary shyness of the great leader, and a few minutes later they were walking off side by side, the girl speaking earnestly and Sherman listening.

The news that the general had to give her, however, was far from reassuring. A decisive battle being now just at hand, it was naturally of the utmost importance for Sherman to ascertain the exact position and approximate strength of the force holding the heights which he was about to storm. Two of Grant's best scouts had accordingly been placed at his disposal, and one of these was "Never-die Joe" himself, who had started on his perilous mission that very morning, an hour before dawn!

Brave as Constance Leigh had always shown herself, she well nigh gave way now. She knew how hard it was for the most practiced scout to deceive the lynx eyed vigilance of the Confederates, and she knew, also, only too well the doom that awaited her lover if detected. Shot as a spy—was this to be the end of the last descendant of the Fortescues? Was this the "third peril" which his dying father had seen in the vision that haunted his last moments?

But a harder trial than even this was in store for her. Toward afternoon the second of the two scouts (an escaped Georgia negro) came back to the camp, bringing with him all the information which the general required; but he brought also the news that his comrade, Joe Joliffe, had been detected and captured by the Confederates, and was doomed to death as a spy!

CHAPTER IV.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

The figure of a woman coming slowly toward them.

In a small wooden shed in the Confederate lines, low down in the dip between Missionary Ridge and Lookout mountain, Joe Joliffe (or, as we may now call him, Viscount Doneraile) lay listening to the measured tramp of the two Confederate soldiers that were on guard outside, and watching through the chinks of the rough planking the going down of the last sun he was ever to see.

At dawn he must die; and the thought of that swift and sudden doom, falling upon him in the fullness of his life and vigor, sent a chill through his bold heart for the first time.

It was not that he feared death; he had faced it too often and longed for it too earnestly for that. But it was not thus that he had expected to die. He had hoped to fall in the front of battle, with the fierce, feverish joy of the combat pulsing hotly through his veins, and the shout of victory in his ear, and the old regimental colors waving above him. And now, instead of all this, he was to be shot down in cold blood as a detected spy!

And then there arose before him, as if in mockery, the glorious vision that had so often brightened his dreams at a time when all his waking moments were black with misery and despair. He seemed to see himself going back to claim before the world the noble birthright of which he had been wrongfully deprived, and the betrothed bride from which he had been cruelly parted. He saw her brightening his grim old feudal castle with the sunshine of her presence, and aiding him to relieve and elevate the oppressed tenantry whom his stern father had ground down into the very dust, and to make the name of "Irish landlord" a title of honor instead of a byword and a curse. And now, in the place of all these golden dreams, there lay before him only a bloody death and a nameless grave.

It was true that one chance of life still remained to him could he but have brought himself to accept it. He knew—for he had been told so plainly enough—that if he would consent to be false to the flag under which he had fought, and aid in misleading and betraying the army to which he belonged, his life would be spared. Perhaps there might have been found some men, if men they can be called, base enough to accept mercy on such terms; but it was not so with Arthur Fortescue. The bitterest foe of his dreaded and hated race had never dared to hint that there had been among them at any time so vile a thing as a traitor, and their last descendant would have perished by the cruelest death that hatred could devise rather than even think of saving himself by such means.

The red glow of sunset was just dying away from the brow of the vast rocky wall of Lookout mountain and the glittering bayonets that crested it, when suddenly there was heard just outside the shed a hoarse challenge, and then a murmur of voices, among which the prisoner distinguished one that sounded strangely familiar to him. Then the door was unbarred, and in came a young man of his own age, in the uniform of a Confederate officer.

Years had passed since those two men last met, but they knew each other in a moment, and the brave young southerner, starting back, exclaimed in a tone of strong emotion:

"Good heavens! Ar"——

"Hush, Percival," said the other, instinctively trying to lift his bound hands in warning. "That name must never be spoken again; I will die as I have lived—unknown."

For an instant the young officer eyed his friend in silence, biting his lips till they bled, and then he said despairingly:

"You know I would give my life for you any day, but even for your sake I must not forfeit my honor. You are my best friend, but still you belong to the enemies of our cause; I cannot let you escape!"

"I know you cannot, my dear boy," rejoined Arthur kindly, "and I should never think of asking you to do it, you may be sure of that. Now, if you have anything special to say to me I am at your service."

The words were spoken as calmly as if addressed to a neighbor at a dinner table, and indeed it was curious enough to see how, all through this strange conference, the man who was already in the grasp of death seemed perfectly cool and collected, while the man who was free and armed with all the power of command was completely unnerved by excitement.

"I can't say it," broke out the gallant lad, with a look of strong disgust on his handsome face. "It would be hard enough to give such a message to a stranger; to give it to you would choke me outright."

"I can guess it," said the viscount, smiling sternly; "you are sent to offer me life once more if I will turn traitor. I will spare you the shame of doing so, for you know what my answer will be, and what yours would be in my place."

Governor Lewelling of Kansas has just pardoned Hugh Gilliland, aged seventy, who was sentenced for life twenty years ago. The pardon was given to his daughter, who was a baby when the sentence was given.

Talks With Tennyson.

Though only my uncle by marriage, no mother's brother could have been more loving to me through life than was my guardian, Lord Tennyson. Of late years our homes had lain far apart, and my opportunities of meeting him were rare, but precious to me is the memory of those days of my youth, when we used to take cross country walks over hedge and ditch, or ramble together over the breezy downs, and when he opened to me the treasure house of his mind and heart.

Everything we came across interested him, and he could see something to admire even in a rawboned old hack grazing by the wayside:

"You would scarcely call that poor beast beautiful," he exclaimed, "with his ribs almost sticking through his skin, but he is certainly picturesque as he stands shivering on the common, his meager tail blowing in the wind. It seems to me that the picturesque is generally associated with age, or the commencement of decay, for take a cottage that when newly built seemed commonplace enough, and pull down some of its thatch, then break the windows, and introduce a baby clad in rags, sprawling across the threshold, and you have at once a picturesque subject for the artist."

His sympathy with nature led him to mourn over the cutting down of trees, as if they were, like the grove in Dante's "Inferno," the abode of his personal friends, and specially did he grieve if the ax smote them in summer time. I well remember his gazing long upon a horse chestnut that had continued to put forth flowers days after it had been felled to the earth. "Look at it," he said, "stretching out a beseeching arm and blossoming on, its blooms unfolding in all their beauty, quite unconscious that they can never turn to fruitage. How like they are to some men, who appear blooming outwardly, and think that they are living, while they are already dead within!"—Agnes G. Weld in Contemporary Review.

How Dr. Depew Got Up a Speech.

Before his death Dr. Vermilye had for many years spoken to the toast "Holland" at the annual dinner of the organization. Some 11 years ago, and on the morning of the day set for the banquet, he was taken ill and notified the dinner committee that he would be unable to make his wonted oration.

At 4 o'clock on the same day Depew entered the office of John A. Nichols at 71 Broadway, New York, wearing a worried expression and a perspiration bedewed forehead.

"Nichols," he said, "I'm in a fix, and want you to help me out. These St. Nicholas people have just wired me that in the absence of Dr. Vermilye they look to me to respond to 'Holland.' I don't know the first thing about the subject, and it's 4 o'clock."

"Well?" said Mr. Nicholas.

"Now," went on Depew, "just you take me by the arm and walk me up Broadway to Twenty-third street. Don't talk to me and don't expect me to talk to you. Just steer me clear of people, mind I don't get run over at the crossings and go slow. That's all I want you to do."

Mr. Nichols did as requested, and the pair did not exchange a word until Twenty-third street was reached at 5:15 p. m.

"Thankee," said Depew as he parted with his friend. "I guess I'm all right."

At 7:30 p. m. the first thing that the eye of Mr. Nichols met as he sat down at the dinner table was the bland, unruffled, smoothly shaven face of Depew. The speech that he made later is yet a delightful tradition in the annals of the St. Nicholas society. It was chock full of wit, fact, figures and sentiment. Nobody but Mr Nichols dreamed that it had been conceived, shaped and born amid the riot and roar of Broadway.—Brooklyn Chronicle.

Beware of the Mirror When Buying Hats

"The mirror is woman's worst enemy," said a Fourth street milliner the other day after a hard day's siege fitting bonnets. "The mirror is at all times a flatterer. A lady will stand in front of the glass and imagine that a bonnet becomes her and the colors are just the thing to suit her complexion. In many cases it is just the reverse, but there is no use of my saying a word about it, for the reason that the purchaser would think I had some object in view in making the suggestion, and nine times out of ten it would spoil a sale."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

An Aluminium Violin.

Dr. Alfred Springer of Cincinnati has shown a new application of the metal aluminium. He has made a violin of it, and the instrument, which was given a public test at a concert before a number of musical experts, has been pronounced eminently satisfactory in the purity and sweetness of its tone. The maker said that 32 cents worth of aluminium sufficed for the construction of the instrument.—Chicago Herald.

ALL THE SAME.

"Many days you have lingered about my cabin door; hard times, hard time come again no more." All the same Merry Christmas and Happy New Year passed as though the land was flowing with milk and honey. Some bought one thing and some bought another, but one of the best investments for a small sum paid well. It was not for a Christmas bush, but thousands got it, and thousands who had suffered long and wearily with rheumatism were made doubly happy in being cured by St. Jacobs Oil. It leaves no trace behind, and, all the same, the harder times will come no more to them. The luxury of health is worth a fortune.

If you neglected to "swear off" on New Year's day, it will do just as well if you will simply quit now.

A WORK OF ART.

Hood's Calendar for 18 5 is "a thing of beauty." In the novelty of the design and the exquisiteness of the coloring, the calendar surpasses all previous issues. The calendar is formed in the shape of a heart, and is ornamented with two beautiful child faces. The calendar gives the usual information concerning the lunar changes, and upon the back is printed a table of astronomical events especially calculated for C. I. Hood & Co.

The calendar is issued to advertise Hood's Sarsaparilla, Hood's Pills and the other preparations of the firm. The edition of Hood's Calendars for 1895 was 10,500,000, or about 2,500,000 more than last year.

Those who are unable to obtain Hood's Sarsaparilla Calendars at the drug stores should send six cents in stamps for one, or ten cents for two, to C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.

A Gentle Corrective

is what you need when your liver becomes inactive. It's what you get when you take Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets; they're free from the violence and the griping that come with the ordinary pill. The best medical authorities agree that in regulating the bowels mild methods are preferable. For every derangement of the liver, stomach and bowels, these tiny, sugar coated pills are most effective. They go about their work in an easy and natural way, and their good lasts. Once used, they are always in favor. Being composed of the choicest, concentrated vegetable extracts, they cost much more than other pills found in the market, yet from forty to forty-four are put up in each sealed glass vial, as sold through druggists, at the price of the cheaper made pills.

"Pleasant Pellets" cure biliousness, sick and bilious headache, dizziness, costiveness, or constipation, sour stomach, loss of appetite, coated tongue, indigestion, or dyspepsia, windy belchings, "heart-burn," pain and distress after eating, and kindred derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels. Put up in sealed glass vials, therefore always fresh and reliable. Whether as a laxative, or in larger doses, as a gently acting but searching cathartic, these little "Pellets" are unequaled.

As a "dinner pill," to promote digestion, take one each day after dinner. To relieve the distress arising from over-eating, nothing equals one of these little "Pellets." They are tiny, sugar-coated, anti-bilious granules. Any child readily takes them.

Accept no substitute that may be recommended to be "just as good." It may be better for the dealer, because of paying him a better profit, but he is not the one who needs help.

Why Americans Have Corns.

"Corns are bad," said the philosophic bootblack. "Yours seem to hurt you some. Strange what lots of people have corns. Over 90 per cent of the men who come to get a shine have corns. How do I know it? How do I know you have a corn? By finding it, of course. Gently? All right, I won't hurt you, guv'nor. As I was saying, 90 out of every 100 have corns. People say its tight boots, but I don't believe it. Those who have the worst corns wear boots that are too large for them. What gives them corns then? Well, I'll tell you. It is wearing boots all day long.

"Seldom do you see Europeans bothered with corns, especially Englishmen. Nearly every American has them. The former never wear their boots all day. They have walking boots to the office. Once there they put on a thin house boot. When they go home, about 5 o'clock in the evening, the first thing they do is to put on their slippers. The result is that the feet are always cool, the pressure never constant and no muscle tried beyond its power. Far otherwise the American. He goes down to work at 8 o'clock in the morning and is hurrying and scurrying in the same boots until 6 o'clock. Then he hurries home to dinner, hurries through dinner, and still wearing the same boots goes to his lodge or elsewhere and returns at midnight, his feet having been cramped up for 14 hours out of 24 in the one pair of boots. The result is corns and bunions."—Chicago Mail.

How Is Experience to Be Gained.

In discussing the part that women have taken in public affairs within the past few years, a gentleman recently objected on the ground of their lack of experience. He did not explain how experience was to be had, except by actual work in the field, whatever and wherever it may be.

When the untrained girl starts out to find employment, she knows very little. It is a rare thing that she has been taught or has the opportunity of learning the requirements of her chosen calling in her own home. If she intends to be a stenographer or bookkeeper, she goes to a business college. If she wishes to be a teacher, she goes to school and then completes her course at some university or normal school. But even then she admits that she has acquired the theory only, and that theory and practice differ most amazingly and unexpectedly.

To obviate this difficulty there are in all the best institutions for the training of teachers—the last instruction given—what is called a training school. Here the woman who has mastered arithmetic and algebra, science and literature, must learn how to instruct and discipline. Were she to go on acquiring theories for 20 years and fail to apply them she would probably be a total failure. Knowledge that falls short of application is productive of little good.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

An Embassador's Privileges.

Hitherto, except on special occasions, Great Britain has only been represented by embassadors in six European realms—the empires of Austria, Turkey, Russia and Germany, the kingdom of Italy and imperial, royal and republican France. Not a quarter of a century ago there were only four British embassies abroad, although the United Kingdom was of course diplomatically represented at every foreign court. It was not until the unification and consolidation of Germany had been completed by William I of Prussia that our legation in Berlin became an embassy. The achievement of Italian unity under Victor Emmanuel suggested and obtained a similar complimentary acknowledgment on the part of our gracious sovereign.

It is unquestionably a judicious and popular "new departure" to emphasize, so to speak, the amicable nature of the relations happily obtaining between the two great English speaking nations by placing our official representation in the capital of the Union upon the highest attainable footing of diplomatic dignity and distinction. An embassador, as the personal representative of his own sovereign, has the right of access to the monarch or chief of the state to whom he is accredited—a privilege which cannot be claimed by, though it is frequently accorded to, a minister plenipotentiary or envoy extraordinary.—London Telegraph.

A Personal Devil In the "Black Country."

Among the inhabitants of the coal regions, while satan is endowed by the popular imagination with a ubiquity scarcely less than omnipresent, he is supposed specially to haunt the shafts and subterranean workings of disused mines. And though practically omnipotent he is invoked by the following absurd spell: A crust of bread and cheese placed inside a hat, with a crossed knife and fork (always an ominous sign), and over this the recitation of the Lord's Prayer backward. You will to this day find people who are prepared to make oath that when as boys they had tried this spell on a pit bank on dark nights and had been brave enough to peep down the shaft they had seen the very form of the evil one glaring at them from the depths below.

Nor was this idea of a personal visible devil confined to the ignorant, profane and careless. With the devout and serious the conception acquired a still more somber and tragic character. Satan became to them not merely the inspirer of foul thoughts and the suggester of sinful actions, but a real physical antagonist after the style of Apollyon in Bunyan's allegory.

Defects In Statistics.

The census of 1850 tells us that there was one criminal in that year to every 3,500 of the population of the United States. The census of 1890 declares the ratio to have risen to one in every 786. The tabulators of 1890 are silent upon three important points having a vital bearing on their figures. They do not say whether the vigilance of the police and the efficiency of the courts had during 40 years changed for the better or the worse, or how far the drift of population to the cities had made it easier to detect crime in 1890 than in 1850, or to what extent crimes in 1890 were so considered in 1850. To come to the case of honest labor—we are told by the census returns, and truly, that wages are higher now than a generation ago, while in the main a dollar buys as much as it did then. But as to how much more the workman wants today than he did 30 or 40 years ago we are uninformed.—New York Sun.

Two Kinds of Astrologists.

There are two kinds of astrologists—those who are intuitive and those who rely solely on mathematical calculations. The latter meet with the greater favor among educated and thoughtful people, while the superstitious and unreasoning have as much, if not more, respect for the seer who knows it simply because he knows it.

Ruthiel of Baltimore, who has been consulted by so many in this community, belongs to the mathematical class. He will not give names, but says he is being constantly consulted by men who rank high in business, political and social life. While he does not say that astrology is a science, he allows it hits entirely too often to be a mere guess or a coincidence.—Edgar Lee in Arena.

TALE OF TWO BABIES.

True Story of Boston Life Related by a Radcliffe College Girl.

The car was crowded when I reached it, and there was only one vacant seat in the front, which I was glad to occupy. Just as I settled back, with a sigh of satisfaction, even before I had a chance to become curious about my neighbor, I heard from the rear of the car a baby's fretful cry and a wearied mother's voice trying to soothe the tired child. Mingled with these sounds came a second mother's tone, drawling but complacent.

"Ned," she said, "hear that poor little sing try. Ned is a dood baby. He never cries!"

Of course my cariosity was aroused, and I turned to see the rival babies and their mammas. The fussy little one was in full sight. One rosy cheek rested on the shoulder of a neat but travel stained little woman. The pretty, baby blue eyes were filled with tears, the chubby little fellow was sucking his thumb and doing his best to go to sleep, but the time and the place were against him. The patient, dark eyes of the mother rested lovingly on the sweet, troubled face of her boy as she rocked him softly in her arms.

All this I saw in a moment, and I then tried to look beyond this interesting mother and her natural boy to that wonderful baby that never cried and to his proud parent. I could not see them, however, because the restless little head hid them from me, but every now and then there came to my ear the hush of one voice, followed by the proud tone of the other.

At last the train stopped with one of those backing, bumping motions with which we are all familiar. Then the terrified scream of the thoroughly aroused baby made the nervous mother hasten to leave the car as quickly as possible. Following her and close behind her was a fat woman, with wrinkles in the back of her neck and a large, showy hat. She lifted her baby up with one jeweled hand, and as she kissed him on the pug nose drawled out: "Ned's a dood boy. Ned's mamma's own sweet, precious doggie."—Boston Globe.

BEWARE OF FRESH OLIVES.

How a California Planter Amuses Himself at the Expense of Innocent Travelers.

Eastern visitors in California are always much interested in the olive plantations which, in recent years, have become a feature of the most southerly counties of the state. The lovers of the succulent fruit when pickled and bottled for sale in the east and north are always anxious to taste the olive fresh and ripe. There is a popular impression that it is sweet and delicious; but, like many other popular impressions, this is a delusion and a snare.

A few miles south of San Diego, where the railroad makes a junction with a small one track road leading into Mexico, a large planter has taken advantage of this delusion for his own amusement. On the arrival of each train from the north numerous travelers dismount to wait the starting of the train across the Mexican border. For their benefit the planter has nailed a box outside of his fence just across the way from the railroad station which he keeps filled with nice, ripe olives. A placard invites victims in these words:

FINE, FRESH, RIPE OLIVES, FREE.
HELP YOURSELF.

Of course there is a rush from the station as soon as the box and its contents are discovered, and swarms of innocents seize the pretty fruit and dig their teeth into it. Then there is a combined howl and a great deal of expectoration and disgust, for the delusive fruit are nearly as puckery as persimmons.

And the planter? Oh, he takes his fun from a partly hidden summer house within his grounds, where he occasionally seats himself to enjoy the spectacle. It is a sure cure for the blues, he says.—New York Herald.

Chicken on the Shell.

In a certain rather pretentious but cheap priced restaurant I witnessed a scene which, though funny enough to the outside onlooker, could not but have been extremely mortifying to the proprietor. The proprietor was also the cook, and he was engaged in industriously frying a number of pancakes on a griddle placed for show in the window when a party of three who had just entered ordered a trio of eggs apiece. The proprietor thereat seized nine of the ovids from a box beneath the counter and began to break them one after another upon the griddle. He had reached the eighth egg when, lo and behold! instead of a yolk and albumen spreading itself temptingly into view, came a small confused mass of feathers, minute claws, a beak, etc. A look of horror spread itself over the man's face as he gazed at the unwelcome apparition, and then gazing over his shoulder and seeing that his action was unnoticed he swept the griddle clear of its offending burden, greased it anew and proceeded with his work. O cookery, how many frauds are practiced in thy name!—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

Highest Fountain Jet.

The wonder of the New England states, an oddity of which mention is, for some unknown reason, seldom made in print, is the monster fountain jet at the Home of Destitute Women and Children, near Bennington, Vt. The column of water in this jet rises to a height of 198 feet, being the highest known single fountain jet in the world.—St. Louis Republic.

How a Fortune Was Handed Down.

If you go to William Quincy's office, you learn from the legend on the door that he is a lawyer whose business is in real estate. He is himself a large real estate owner. The history of his fortune is almost romantic. His grandfather, the second Josiah Quincy, inherited a considerable estate from the founder of the family, who was the president of Harvard college and otherwise distinguished. The grandfather some 40 or more years ago interested himself in the construction of the Troy and Greenfield railroad, a part of which is now known as the Hoosac Tunnel line, and was not able to carry out his undertakings.

He was financially embarrassed, but did not become a bankrupt. He was possessed of a very large amount of property, and his creditors saw that in time he would be able to meet all his obligations, or that in the event of his death his estate would do so. The property was therefore converted into a trust, the creditors appointing a trustee and Mr. Quincy another.

This trust has lasted until the present time, but is about to be abrogated, all the obligations having now been provided for. For a number of years the present Josiah Quincy has been the principal trustee and manager of the estate, which will be worth $2,000,000 when the trust terminates.—Boston Cor. Washington Post.

Kossuth a Boodler? Never!

No one familiar with the career of Louis Kossuth will for a moment credit the charge that the splendid and chivalrous manhood which dared death and exile for a principle has yielded to the base influence of a bribe giver. It is true that William of Orange and Lord Bacon, both statesmen and patriots of high rank, practiced bribery. Lord Clive and William Penn were also engaged in the same traffic. But Kossuth belongs to another age.

The ex-dictator of Hungary is said to have accepted $5,000 a year as the price of support for the present Hungarian cabinet. The absurdity of the accusation is shown by the fact that Kossuth has repeatedly declined the offer of King Humbert to settle a large pension on him and has even refused money from his own sons, preferring to earn his living in his old age by his pen, and thus enjoy the sense of independence. When Kossuth was expatriated three years ago 80 Hungarian cities and towns conferred honorary citizenship upon him within 10 days after the law went into effect. At that time the venerable patriot resolutely rejected all proffered gifts of money.

Attended Funerals and Denounced Rum.

A singular old fellow, Austin Roberts, who was a sort of a genius, died at the town farm at East Hartford the other day, aged 71 years. The two passions of his life were temperance and a fondness for funerals. He never missed a chance to lecture on the "Demon Rum" or attend a funeral. During his life he had been a purely disinterested mourner at a good many more obsequies than he was able to remember and had delivered scores of lectures in grandiloquent phrases in halls or at the street corners, just as fate or luck would have it.

For many years he was employed by George Reynolds, who made and sold "hop and nectar beer" of the tame sort. He was a lively and eloquent drummer and led the first firemen's parade ever held in Hartford. He spent his life trying to amuse his fellow man and make him "better and purer" and all that, and his fellow man put him in the town poorhouse in his old age.—Hartford Letter.

Drinking In Gotham.

The New York papers are claiming that Gotham is more strongly opposed to drunkenness than any other city in the world. The moral consolation of this assurance is somewhat impaired from the fact that the sobriety claimed for the city is accounted for in the practice of the leading saloons of shutting off a man's grog when it becomes apparent that he is getting too many sails in the wind. Of course he takes on the balance of his cargo at any accessible port, and the stand made for sobriety under this system does not amount to much. There may be something in the claim that the outsiders who visit New York do most of the drinking, but Gothamites abroad indicate by their habits that home consumption has a good deal to do with the prosperity of saloon keepers in the metropolis.—Detroit Free Press.

To Hello Across the Continent.

The longest telephone circuit in the world is now projected by the Automatic Telephone and Electric company of Canada, which intends to lay a line of copper wires on the metallic circuit plan from Halifax to Vancouver. This is a distance of 3,500 miles. Copper is by far the best conductor, and electricians have so far advanced their methods that they can calculate to a nicety what is required. The circuit will be, of course, in sections and be available for communication to many intermediate points. It is a great and wonderful experiment which the scientific world will watch with intense interest. If it proves a success, there seems to be no good reason why the instrument cannot be used to transmit speech across the widest oceans.—Portland Oregonian

FROM DANCING FLOOR TO SURF.

Men and Maidens In Honolulu Take a Swim During an Intermission.

Saturday evening I had the pleasure of attending one of the unique entertainments—a swimming party—that are a feature in Honolulu and are probably known nowhere else in the world. It was given by Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Nilson, formerly residents of Kenwood, now of San Francisco. It was given at Waikiki, a seaside annex of the Royal Hawaiian hotel. The apartment known as the lanai looks directly upon the sea, the waves breaking beneath the windows and against the steps of the piazzas. In the rear of the lanai is a large apartment for dancing, and opening from this an immense dining room.

The masculine guests were, with a few exceptions, officers from our own men-of-war and from the English corvette Garnett—handsome young fellows, who cleared their throats a good deal, curtailed their r's piteously and danced with muscular vigor. They did not possess the ease of manner peculiar to their American fellow officers.

There was first a waltz or two, then the party separated, disappeared and reappeared clad in bathing suits. The guests then moved in procession across the long pier, and the young girls, clasping their hands above their heads, leaped into the surf, accompanied by their escorts. They swam and dived in the clear water like mermen and mermaids. The southern cross rose above the horizon; palms were outlined in the moonlight against the clear sky; the turf dashed its white foam against the reefs beyond the lagoon; the air was filled with the fragrance of a thousand flowers; the singing boys sat upon the pier, and their wild music made a fitting accompaniment to one of the strangest scenes I ever beheld.

After a time the swimmers repaired to their rooms, redonned their evening dress, and the ball went on as if it had never been interrupted. It was difficult to realize that the young women in their white gowns, sashes and French heeled shoes were the same whose white arms and bare feet had been battling with the breakers half an hour before. The dancing was followed by supper, then the waltzing and singing were resumed, and the morning was well on its way before the guests made their adieus and took their departure.—Honolulu Cor Chicago Inter Ocean.

The Direction of One's Bed.

"The first thing I do when I get to a hotel is to see how my bed stands in regard to the points of the compass," said Frederick Wilbur. "It is usual in fixing up a room to put the bed where most convenient, without regard to the direction in which the head points, and this is really the principal reason why travelers sleep soundly in one town and lie awake grumbling all night in the next. To obviate this, I take my bearings with a little pocket compass, and if my bed is not arranged with the head facing either north or south I swing it around right away and make it face north if possible, accepting the south as a compromise.

"Some people think it all nonsense to talk about a current of magnetism passing steadily from pole to pole, but any telephone operator or fixer will show you in a few minutes that this is actually the case. If you sleep with your head to the east or the west, you don't get the benefit of this electric current, while if you lie in proper position it passes through the body during the night and has a soothing, recuperative effect. Try the experiment and you will laugh at those who take opiates with a view to wooing refreshing sleep."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

An Electric Horn For Ships.

An electric horn has been devised to take the place of electric bells or gongs, more especially on ships where an alternating current of electricity is available. The apparatus is based upon the principle of the telephone receiver and consists, in its simplest form, of a disk of sheet iron placed in front of one of the poles of an electro magnet, the coil of which is arranged to take an alternating current of 100 volts, with a current of a given number of alternations. The pitch of the note is constant, no matter what the diameter or thickness of the disk may be, since the latter is obliged to vibrate at the same rate.

The timbre and intensity of the sound, however, can be made to vary in a number of ways. In order to obtain an intense sound with a small amount of current, the diaphragm, or disk, must strike, while vibrating, the iron core or some other body. In this apparatus there is no break in the current, as occurs in the ordinary electric bell, and the sound is therefore continuous.—New York Telegram.

Didn't Know What Struck Him.

He stepped jauntily into the front hall and said to the practical little lady of the house: "Madam, I have here a medicine that enables the human stomach to digest anything that reaches it. This simple remedy also prevents heartburn, stimulates the salivary glands, averts dyspepsia, sweetens the breath and sustains the normal powers of the stomach. A boarder of yours, madam, suggested that you should keep a supply of these powders on hand and give one with each of your hot homemade biscuits." When the hired girl handed the fellow his hat and the man of all work kindly helped him to the nearest street car line, he was asking in a dazed sort of way how the explosion occurred and whether the house was insured.—Detroit Free Press.

Sunset In the Canyons.

In the deep canyons one is soon overtaken by night. Indeed in some of these intricate pathways (the work of aqueous erosion) the sunlight, if it enters at all, stays but a few moments. As the sun goes down the changes that are marshaled on are singularly beautiful. The vivid green tints of the chaparral so brilliant at midday begin to fade and assume a deep purple, over which a delicate silvery mist imperceptibly draws its veil. On it creeps, the royal tint becoming more intense, until suddenly it takes on a fiery glow, and over all the slopes there plays a roseate light—the warm good night of the upper range.—Charles F. Holder in Californian.

Widespread Superstitions.

There is still a widespread belief in the south that the meat of hogs killed during the decrease of the moon will shrink in the cooking more than the meat of animals killed when the moon is crescent, and there are hundreds of persons south of Mason and Dixon's line who are careful to plant potatoes when the moon is right, lest the increase be small or none.—Exchange.

Japan's First Lady Lawyer.

An interesting traveler has lately arrived in England in the person of Mme. Tel Sono, who enjoys the unique position of being the first and only lady lawyer in Japan. While engaged in her profession she had many opportunities of discovering the downtrodden condition of her country women and conceived the idea of founding a Christian training school for women in her native town of Tokio. She then gave up her work in Tokio and visited America with a view of learning the customs of a country whose women were on an equality with men.

Mme. Tel Sono spent 12 tears in America, where her adventures were many and varied. Shortly after her arrival the bank in which her money was placed failed, and in order to support herself and also to collect funds for her proposed school she was in turn a domestic servant, a scholar in an English school, a dressmaker's apprentice and finally the organizer of a benevolent society for helping her fellow countrywomen living in San Francisco. Mme. Tel Sono collected £600 while in America and has come to England with the same idea in view—giving lectures and speaking at different halls in her quaint broken English.

She has also written a book entitled "Tel Sono, the Japanese Reformer," in which she gives a most interesting account of her life. This she sells for the benefit of the funds of her school. The class she aims to reach is the highest in Japan, that which the missionaries cannot reach, and which Mme. Tel Sono hopes to help and teach, belonging as she does to it herself. Her father was a doctor and philosopher, and her husband, whom she married at the age of 19, an officer of the king's treasure. She has one daughter, whom, however, she has not taken with her on her travels.—Hearth and Home.

Women and Tipping.

A woman never feels more "emancipated" than when she tips a waiter. There is something entertainingly reckless and fascinatingly masculine about it. It is not so many years that we have had money to spend as we liked. And in those days when every dollar had to be accounted for at headquarters before we got the next it would have been flying in the face of providence indeed to pay for anything not on the bill.

A woman who prides herself upon her independence now tips the waiter if it takes her all, but car fare.

She finds exhilaration in having a "go," as an English girl would put it, at improvidence herself.

A great deal has been said lately about what might be called a modern form of table tipping, and it seems that the waiters are paid such very small salaries that if they don't receive tips they don't pay their own bills.

This puts a very different face on the matter, for it amounts to presenting the man's employer with our small change. And nothing makes a woman madder than to have her generosity counted upon. She gives gifts because she chooses and because they will surprise people, not at all because she is expected to.

And woman having proved that she can tip if she likes will probably band herself into antitipping societies and show that as soon as she understands the workings of the system she does not like it.—Grace E. Drew in New York Press.

Dainty and Expensive For Brides.

Those who are not deeply interested in trousseau secrets can hardly imagine the vast amount of needlework put into wedding lingerie. The latest conceptions of nightgown, petticoat and waist are exceedingly dainty. I saw a petticoat bodice the other day which was composed entirely of fine insertions. The tucking on all of these garments is a triumph of fine needlework. Just look at one nightgown, for instance, in a set made to order for a spring bride. It is empire shape, with the short yoke bodice made of alternate strips of rare lace and muslin embroidery. Fairylike frills of the muslin edged with lace form jabots, while the big sleeves have two great puffs in the arm, held at elbow and wrist with white satin ribbon.

Other pieces are trimmed with lace run with baby blue or pink ribbons. White ribbons used for girdles are worked with forgetmenots. Silk mull underkerchiefs, to be worn under satin stays, are edged with real lace. A snow white silk petticoat, fitting smoothly over the hips and flaring at the hem, with a knife plaiting of silk 6 inches deep, veiled with another of white grenadine, vandyked and bordered with lace over the plaiting is a piece of extravagance of which only a bride could be guilty.—Brooklyn Eagle.

The Wearing of Colored Skirts.

"It's the queerest thing about white petticoats," said a lady to me, who keeps up with, not to say a little in advance of, the times.

"A year ago, six months even, there was nothing so tricky as a white skirt, unless it was another with more starch in it.

"This spring you don't feel quite tidy without white lingerie, and the more starch the merrier.

"Did you ever know what men think about colored skirts?" she went on. "One I know awfully well said to me only yesterday: 'I wish you would tell me what you girls wear black silk skirts for. They are in wretched taste.'

"What I wanted to reply was that no woman would be seen wearing a black skirt this summer except she who is saving on her laundry bills. But it was worse to say that than to let him think we liked the colored ones, so I simpered and said nothing."—New York Press.

ETHICS OF THE REGISTER.

What Hotel People Have to Say About Titles and Degrees.

For a man to take a lady to dine at a hotel and register as "Mr. So-and-so and lady" is considered the height of ignorance by hotel clerks. The proper way is to register both names, or, if the man is sensitive, to write "Mr. So-and-so and one." This is sometimes done, but not very often. To use "and lady" is bad form in this generation, when it comes to hotel registers, for obvious reasons. But this is not the only evidence of bad form which is seen on the register. When a man pens Mr. before his name he is judged as being egotistical, and no professional man will put Dr. or Prof. before his name if he desires to avoid the clerk's anathemas.

Many city people exhibit their ignorance of good breeding by going to a local hotel and giving the number and street of their residence. A notable instance of this is a well known jeweler, who, when he puts his name on a register, which is frequent, invariably puts his business address after it. To put Hon., Gen., Capt. or any other title before a man's name on a hotel register is as bad as Prof. or Dr.—in fact, it is looked upon as worse by all good hotel men.

The only exception to the above is in case of theatrical people, who put the name of their company after their names. All professional stage people get reduced rates at hostelries in nearly every instance, and for them to put the names of their troops on the book is a good thing for the hotel people. It goes to show that the person thus registering is not afraid of being questioned as to his connection with a company and is not trying to get lower rates in a surreptitious manner. It is also in the case of theatrical people that there may be a permissible violation of the rules in regard to putting Mr. before the name. Many stars do not register, but allow some one else to do it for them, generally the manager. In order to show all possible deference to his proteges, the manager generally puts Mr. before the names of the men. In the cases of ladies it is invariably proper for them to put Miss or Mrs., as the case may be, in front of their names.—New York Dispatch.

The Dog Man Escaped.

She was standing on her front steps on Hastings street telling two or three women how it happened. She waved a broom about her head and said:

"I was in the back bedroom up stairs, making up the bed. My husband was down in the kitchen, heating a sticking plaster for his sore heel. Our dog was sitting on the curbstone right out there. Suddenly I hears a rumble on the cobblestones, and I takes it for a funeral procession and goes ahead and turns over the mattress on the bed. Then I hears the children whooping, but I thought they had a goat. Then comes a squeak, and a howl, and a bang, and I runs to the window to see the dog wagon driving off and my dog gone."

"And you screamed?" queried one of the women.

"I did. I screamed out and seized the club I've been keeping for the dog man. As I rushed down stairs my husband rushed up, and we collided and rolled down into the kitchen and under the table, and he called me names, and I thumped him, and before I could get out the dog man was gone, and with him the blessedest dog that Detroit will ever know."—Detroit Free Press.

Well Done.

One of the most unique specimens of the courting crisis on record occurred at a London dinner party. He had long made love to her, and while at the table he learned from a friend sitting next to him that his rival intended to "pop the question" that very day. What was to be done? He was some distance from her, while the dreaded rival was at her side. Tearing a leaf from a notebook, he wrote on it with a pencil: "Will you be my wife? Write your answer, yes or no, on this paper and return it to me." This he sent to her by a waiter, saying: "To the lady in blue at the end of the table. Be very careful." This servant was careful enough, but the sender forgot to give him the pencil for the lady to use. She didn't have a pencil, but she coolly put the note into her bosom and answered to the waiter, "Tell the gentleman yes," with as little betrayal of excitement as if she were accepting an invitation to a game of croquet.—London World.

Love Laughs at Doctors.

A young man wanted to marry a girl, but her rich parents forbade the match. The young man thereupon became sick and had terrible fainting fits. The doctors were called and said he would soon die, and he said he wanted to die. The father of the girl visited the patient, and the poor fellow said that if he could marry his Mary Ann he would die happy. His dying request could certainly not be refused, and, Mary Ann having no objection, the minister was sent for, and the marriage ceremony was performed. The knot being securely tied, the patient rose from his bed a hale man.

It was a great cure, astonishing both the cruel parents and the doctors, but the bride acted as though she had expected it all the time.—London Tit-Bits.

Absentminded.

Benson—I have a literary friend who is so absentminded that, when he went to London recently, he telegraphed himself ahead to wait for himself at a certain place.

Smith—Did the telegram have the desired result?

"No; he got it all right, but he had forgotten to sign his name, and not knowing who it was from he paid no attention to it."—Pearson's Weekly.

Coffee planting was formerly the most important single industry of Ceylon. Now tea is the leading article of export, having risen from £2,000 worth in 1878 to over £1,000,000 two years ago.

Through Childhood's Eyes.

I wonder if we wouldn't like to go back again and see how it feels to be 5 years old! To feel the dance in our feet and the morning in our faces; to look at the big world again through baby eyes! Some of us have forgotten all about it and are gold plated so heavily that our souls can't get out to get a breath of air. But some of us remember.

We remember how we looked out of life's east windows and saw the dawn angels pull back the curtains of pink and gold to wake up the sun. We listened wide eyed and wondering when the brook told us about the water sprites that emptied their pitchers away up on the hillside. Why, we knew all that the birds said to each other then. How is it we cannot understand now? We knew just as well when Mrs. Robin went down into the garden to do some shopping and left her husband to keep house, because we heard him scolding about it all to himself up in the pear tree.

And there used to be fairies then. Why, once I knew where fairyland was! It was in a corner of the old rail fence. An apple tree stretched its long, knotted arms over it; the grass stood about with its long, delicate ears pricked up to listen.

There were many little bowers in fairyland, winding walks and groves of cedar and evergreen twigs, bits of flower beds and choice clumps of moss. In the midst was a lovely lake, and only the grownup people imagined it to be a piece of looking glass. That was because they couldn't see. And on moonlight nights the fairies came, for there used to be fairies then.—Dorothy Deane in Chicago News-Record.

Expenses at the World's Fair.

The admission ticket entitles the visitor to see all of the World's fair proper, covering 500 acres of Jackson park. This includes access to the 12 principal buildings, the state and government buildings and the headquarters of all countries represented. The guidebook may be bought in one large volume or in parts. A few cents will be charged for rolling chairs, gondolas and boats on the lagoon. These will be a great assistance in economizing time and strength. Guides who will pilot a party of five for 50 cents an hour may be hired, but the Columbian guards are prepared to give information, and armed with a catalogue you will have but little use for a guide.

For the one admission fee you may also walk in the Midway plaisance and see the curious foreign architecture and modes of life and industry. If you desire to enter any of the buildings or villages, a fee of about 25 cents will have to be paid, as these are private concessions.

If you are prepared to economize, you can live comfortably and see all the sights for a month on $100. One hundred and fifty dollars should be enough for any reasonable human being, though of course there is practically no limit to the amount you may spend on souvenirs, works of art and personal display. You can even pay as if you were four persons rolled into one if you insist on a private bathroom at a hotel, but $3 to $5 a day will pay all reasonable expenses.—Chicago Letter.

The President at a Reception.

Mr. Cleveland has by force of precedent continued the ancient custom of receiving the general public three times a week in the great east parlor, but there is little doubt that he should like, as probably any other president would like, to escape this task of handshaking. The hour set for this function is 1:30 p. m., just after the president has eaten luncheon. A man who is so intimately familiar with Mr. Cleveland as to know his private personal ways is authority for the statement that upon every one of these public reception days Mr. Cleveland has gone to his bedroom and there quietly slipped into his pocket a revolver, and then descended the stairs to the east parlor.

Moreover, the throng of visitors who flock to these public receptions is kept at some distance from the president as he stands in the doorway which serves as an exit for those who pass him. This is done by a cordon of servants of the house, who, counting merely the doorkeepers and messengers, entirely outside of the clerical force in executive offices, number at least 20. The visitors string by the president in Indian file, and as they pass him, receiving each one a shake of the hand, they pass also a most pleasant but determined looking man standing exactly opposite Mr. Cleveland. The people do not know it, but this man is also armed.—New York Recorder.

The Universality of Superstition.

Almost everybody has some touch of superstition, and as men grow older they seem to be the more effected by the savage fancy. A club in New York has been trying for many years to shatter the old time superstition of the unluckiness of 13 at table, but the superstition remains the same as ever. No campaign for president occurs when mascots or fetiches are not brought forward for the benefit of favored candidates. During the campaign of 1892 a good Democrat of North Carolina took pains to send Vice President Stevenson a graveyard rabbit's foot, and since then the furnishing of such talismans or mascots has become an advertised business. Pious people have been accustomed to seek supernatural guidance by taking the verse which first catches their sight when they open the Bible by chance.

Gamblers and speculators of all kinds are usually superstitious. Jay Gould was a remarkably logical man, but it became evident in the later years of his life that he stood in fear of the unseen powers and influences of an immaterial world. Even where there is no religious faith, superstition exists and sometimes is stronger for that lack. Very many hard headed men, if they confessed the truth, would be obliged to acknowledge that they are seriously affected by a fear of omens which they know to be silly.—New York Sun.

The Value of Manilla Paper When Cooking.

Clean manilla paper is far too useful to be thrown away. It will instantly absorb all grease from fishcakes, fried potatoes, ham or anything of the sort, and it is but a minute's work to slip out the paper and put it in the fire when the dish is ready to serve. A piece laid over the bread dough, under the cloth, will prevent the formation of the hard crust so annoying to breadmakers.—Exchange.

Literary Women In Paris.

There are now not less than 2,133 literary women in Paris, of whom 1,211 write novels or books for children, 217 pedagogical works, and 280 devote themselves to poetry. The others do not limit themselves to any one department of literary work.

Oranges are rolling out of Los Angeles at the rate of 100 car loads a day. The Eastern taste will soon be educated to the Southern California flavor, and by the time Florida and the foreign orchards begin to produce again there will be no market for the product.

It is proposed to hang a medallion of the late Creed Haymond in the capitol at Sacramento. Why? What great deed did this attorney for the Southern Pacific Railroad corporation perform for the state before death relieved him of further responsibility? We honor heroes and statesmen and benefactors of the people, but we are not bound to perpetuate the memory of corporation lawyers.

Mayor Sutro is reported by the Examiner to be already disgusted with official life and wishes he were "1000 miles away from politicians." He "cannot understand why the board of Supervisors acts as it does" and the Board reciprocates by saying that Sutro is "an old fakir and only howls when his personal interests are attacked." Yet San Francisco is to have eighteen months more of this circus between the monkey and the parrot.

The process of stringing a man up by the thumbs to make him tell some kind of a story, as practiced by the Provisional Government of Hawaii, is likely to cause them trouble, but we presume the report will be officially denied. If, however, it should be proved that Captain Davies, an American citizen, was strung up by the thumbs and kept suspended for six hours, it will be sufficient incentive for this Government to deal heroically in the premises—it may even lead to the ultimate annexation of the islands by this country in accordance with the persistant demand of a large section of the American people.

When a government goes into the banking business, as this government has, it must take its chances just the same as other bankers do. The chances at present seem to be all in favor of the private bankers. They have only to manipulate the government's paper money, legal tender for all debts, public and private, to draw out of the Treasury the gold that the laws require shall be kept on hand to redeem the government's obligations and keep all its various kinds of money at a paricty. The sooner the government goes out of the bankin busines, the better.

The Legislature should pass the proposed measure which provides another method of making tax sales in the place of that which has long prevailed in California and out of which altogether too many men have become rich. The pending bill provides that the State should be the purchaser of all lands upon which taxes are unpaid and that five years should be allowed the delinquent owner within which to redeem his land. It also provides that the land shall, during that period, be regularly taxed and that whoever pays these taxes shall be informed upon the face of his receipt that the taxes of a certain previous year were not paid and that the land was sold therefore. It is apparent that this ought to have been the law long before now. The reason why taxes become delinquent are mainly three: First, because the owner is for the time impecunious and unable to pay his tax; second because of some mistake of the owner or of the officers of the law during the process of assessment and taxation; third, because the title to the land is involved in litigation. None of these reasons supplies any justification for the enormities of the present law. If the owner is embarrassed it is a time for indulgence on the part of the State and not for a surrender of him to the tender mercies of the sharks who fatten on the penalties of tax sales. If there has been an honest mistake on the part of the owner or of the officials the former should not be made to bleed for it. If the title is in litigation the rightful claimant ought not to have his patrimony endangered by tax deeds issued during the period of dispute. There are many excellent reasons for which this proposed measure should become a law.

The Best Size of Frames and the Correct Number to the Hive.

1. Without taking into consideration the desirability of conforming to a standard size, would an eight frame hive having frames of the Langstroth length and 11¾ inches deep be better than an ordinary eight frame hive? 2. If so, why? If not, why not? 3. Would it be better than a ten frame Langstroth hive? 4. If so, why? If not, why not? 5. If there were no standard, what would you consider the best depth for a frame of Langstroth length, and how many of them should be in a hive if the frames are all in one story?

The foregoing was recently answered as follows in The American Bee Journal. E. France wrote: I use the regular Langstroth frame, eight in each story, and three stories high for extracted honey. The Langstroth frame is good enough. Why bother or putter with odd sizes?

Professor A. J. Cook said: 1. We wish to work for comb honey, and shallow hives are best. 2. I prefer the regular eight frame hive. 3. I doubt if one uses a hanging frame if there is any better hive than Langstroth eight frame regular standard size.

C. H. Dibbern replied: 1. Decidedly no. 2. For extracted honey there would be little objection, but for comb honey the bees have too far to travel. 3. I think not. 4. Because Langstroth is standard. 5. I should prefer ten frames not over seven inches deep.

Mrs. Jennie Atchley, Texas, answered: 1. Too much comb and weight in a frame that size for me. I do not think it would be as good. 2. Too deep for easy manipulation. If I were going to change the Langstroth frame at all in depth, I would make it shallower rather than deeper. 3 and 4. No, for reasons stated above. 5. About seven inches deep, ten frames to a hive, and with my experience I would have a hive only one story for either comb or extracted honey.

Dadant & Son write: We would use ten frames, say 12 inches deep and of Langstroth length. Our reasons are that the queen always lays eggs in a circle, and she should be able to lay as large an amount as possible without having to hunt. For this reason a shallower frame is objectionable. Another point in favor of the deeper frame is in the need of honey over the brood nest in extreme cold weather, as the bees often starve when the honey supply fails above them. A square frame would be better than any other if it were not that it leaves too little room above for surplus cases, which compels tiering up too high.

Mending Grain Sacks.

Mending the holes in grain sacks is a task that the farmer's wife dislikes; hence the holes gnawed by mice and rats are often stopped with a corncob or the sacks are thrown away. But here is a plan suggested by American Agriculturist that proves to be what every farmer needs. The articles needed for mending grain sacks are an old sack that may be cut up for pieces, a batter made of flour and cold water, a hot flatiron and an ironing board to fit inside the sacks. Place the board in a sack, with the hole to be mended on the upper side. Trim away the raveled edges with the shears or a sharp knife. Cut out a patch having at least an inch margin larger than the hole. On this margin apply a coat of the flour paste, place the patch in position and press it thoroughly with the hot flatiron. The batter penetrates both patch and sack and very firmly unites them. Pieces of denim, ducking or other stout material may be used where bagging is not available. The process is so rapid that 100 sacks may soon be repaired. Carpets may be neatly mended in the same manner without removing them from the floor.

Rules of Rotation.

As laid down by the Florida Times-Union the best rules are, first, crops of the same species and even of the same natural order should not succeed each other; second, plants with perpendicular roots should succeed those with spreading and superficial roots, and vice versa; third, crops which occupy the soil for several years, like asparagus, rhubarb, etc., should be followed by those of short duration; fourth, two crops alike favorable to the growth of weeds should not occupy the soil in succession; fifth, crops abstracting largely from the soil the sulphates, phosphates and nitrogen principles should not follow each other immediately, but be succeeded by those which draw less from the soil and more from the atmosphere—these exhausting crops should follow and be followed by those which bear and will profit by heavy manuring; sixth, plants grown for their roots or bulbs should not follow those grown for the same purpose, and still less should plants grown for their seeds follow each other directly in succession.

A Good Word For the Houdans.

Houdans stand at the head of the French varieties of poultry, and while their success here when first imported was not so triumphant as had been expected they were proved a great acquisition, being good layers and exceptionally fine for all table purposes. Their popularity, however, has increased very rapidly in the last few years, and they now bid fair to become one of the most popular and extensively bred varieties.

The Houdans mature very early—earlier, in fact, than almost any variety except the Hamburgs, and resemble the latter in the rapidity with which the chicks feather and the very common occurrence of nonsitters. Their flesh is very fine, a characteristic of all French breeds, and its delicacy is frequently thought greater than that of any of the Asiatics or heavier breeds, approaching in the 4-months-old broilers very near perfection.

SHE WAS OVER EIGHTEEN.

And So the Groom, Aged Seventy-five, Easily Got a License.

Christmas morning County Clerk Fessier was in his office attending to certain imperative work when the iron door, which was slightly ajar, was pulled slowly open, and a man, whose hair was as white as the driven snow, with a beard fully as frosty in appearance, came into the room and walked up to the counter.

"Say, you young man over there," began the ancient gentleman, "is this 'ere the place whar they giv' up c'tificates fur tu git mar'ed?"

"This is the place where marriage licenses are issued," said Mr. Fessler, who added, "Do you desire a marriage license?"

"That's 'bout the size uv it," said the old man, and he shambled over to the license window.

"You will have to produce a witness who can swear that the lady is over 18 years of age." This was the information given to the antiquarian.

"Well, you jist wait a minit," he replied and then disappeared. Within a few seconds he reappeared, and with him came a lady whose hair was as white as his own, and whose appearance indicated that she was but little behind him in the race of life.

"Now, look here, son," said the old man, "this 'ere lady is tu be the bride. I don't think she is tu giddy not fur tu kno' her o'n mind, do you?"

No further questions were asked. The affidavits were drawn. George H. Wilson swore that he was over 21 years old, while Mary E. Ausman made affidavit that she was more than 18 years of age.

"Say, son," remarked the old man as he took the lady by the hand and started for the door, "say, son, I'm 75 years old, and she's 72."

They were seen going down the Delaware street stairway hand in hand, apparently as happy as though their footsteps had not passed the border line of threescore and ten years.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

THEY LOVE PEACE.

But They Will Fight to Protect the Queen and Their Wives From the French.

Although no great power has been able to find an excuse, good in diplomacy, for interference in behalf of the Malagasy, it is not an exaggeration to say that the public opinion of Europe is unanimously opposed to the French plans for the subjugation of the island. Much sympathy for the islanders is excited by the description of the annual ceremony of the bath received in London this week. Madagascar is not without her old man eloquent. The prime minister, addressing the queen, said: "We will defend you and our fatherland to the last breath. We have guns, cannon, powder, shot and all the necessaries of war ready and prepared. I have heard what women say. They say the French are bad and wicked, and they know a good deal about it. But rest assured we will never again allow our wives and daughters to be taken by the French. You, our queen and mistress, love peace. So do we, but not at the price the French ask for it. We will therefore resist. We will fight till we die rather than submit."

Strangers in Antananarivo at the annual feast were surprised to see the population given up entirely to the merry-making which accompanies the bath which the queen and all her subjects take once a year. Nobody was disturbed apparently by the knowledge of an invading army being gathered to deprive them of their independence.—London Letter.

A Wonderful Linguist.

The death is announced at Bournemouth, England, of the Rev. Solomon Cæsar Malan, one of the greatest linguists of the age. In addition to French, German, Latin, Spanish, Italian and Greek, he was master of Hebrew, Sanskrit, Chinese, Armenian, Coptic, Syriac, Ethiopic, Sahidic, Memphitic, Gothic, Georgian, Slavonic, Arabic, Persian, Tibetan, Japanese, Anglo-Saxon, Welsh and many other languages. His last work, completed just before his death, "Original Notes on the Book of Proverbs," contains nearly 16,000 illustrated quotations culled from the eastern fathers. In the Bodleian library at Oxford is a volume containing a psalm written by him in more than 80 languages. He was the son of Dr. Cæsar Malan of Geneva and was born in 1812.—New York Post.

Progress In the South.

The south has made wonderful industrial progress in the last 14 years, and in no year has it gone forward with as much rapidity as in that which has just closed—a year of depression. Since 1880 the railroad mileage of the south has been more than doubled. The yield of cotton for 1894 is nearly twice the yield of cotton in 1880. The yield of grain has been 450,000 more bushels than in 1880. Five times the amount of coal was mined in 1894 than in 1880, and the amount of capital invested in cotton mills between the years mentioned shows a like increase. So through the entire list.—Chicago Times.

The Fall In English Wheat.

The fall in the production and price of wheat and other grain in England is shown in a manner which startles British agriculturists by the returns of the board of agriculture for the year just closed. Five years ago the sales of British wheat reached 3,500,000 quarters, the average price being $7.80. Last year less than 2,000,000 quarters were produced at $5.55. Barley and oats have also declined.

The Czar Is Liberal.

A Moscow correspondent tells a story of the new czar which is quite in accordance with all that has been heard of his character. In the list of officers recommended for promotion recently presented to him mention was made of the age and the religion of the nominees. The emperor struck out the column about religion, saying that it was no concern of his.

More Than a Century of Life.

Mrs. Catharine Noland died in Litchfield, Ills., last week, aged 112 years and 9 days. She was born in Wicklow, Ireland, Dec. 25, 1783, seven years before Washington's inauguration. Deceased had for years to wear spectacles, but second sight returned, and when she died she could see as well as in youth. She was probably the oldest woman in Illinois and had lived in Litchfield for 40 years.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

TUESDAY, Feb. 26, 1895.

John Kispert et al vs. John Strohmeyer —Filed answer and cross-complaint.

BORN.

McLEAN—At Lone Pine, February 23, 1895, to Mr. and Mrs. J. G. McLean a son.

C. B. Rawson of Bishop was in town on Monday last.

The Spring of '95. It's here, and opens up with a beautiful day, too.

District Attorney Forbes spent the week at Bishop on official business.

Judge Arnot of Alpine is expected to arrive here next Monday evening.

Charley Collins has put a force of men and teams at work on the big canal.

J. C. Miller and George Gilliam came came down from Fish Spring last Monday.

R. W. Thomas and A. O. Collins of Big Pine were in town last Monday returning next day.

Mrs. F. Rhine started for San Francisco last Tuesday morning, where she expects to remain about a month.

Chas. Anthony spent a few days in town early in the week and started for San Francisco on Tuesday's train.

John Shepherd visited town this morning. He looks very much improved since his recent visit to San Francisco.

La Grippe has broken out again with terrible force in the large European cities. The death rate is reported to be very great.

The County record vault is being tied together with five large iron rods, having plates a foot in diameter outside the walls.

Supervisor Eldred of Big Pine was a visitor at Independence last Monday. He was looking after the roads in this section.

Henry Fehrman has so far recovered from his recent severe accident as to be out again. He still suffers some pain but his condition is steadily improving.

Pasted a dime on a sheet of paper and send to Crocker & Ames, 619 Montgomery St., San Francisco, for Ame's Shoe Protector, the wonderful saver of shoes.

Webb & Whitmore are feeding a large number of stock cattle at the Robinson ranch, Independence. There will be but little loss among stockmen in the Valley this year, the winter having been exceptionally open.

It is reported that Supervisor Wilson has nearly recovered from his recent severe illness and will soon return home. He has been at the Baldwin Hotel San Francisco for the past month under the care of Dr. Regensburger.

Rudolf Axman, president of the Axman Improvment Company of Los Angeles, arrived at Independence on Thursday's stage. Mr. Axman is making a personal examination of the ground with a view to taking a large contract here.

At a quarter past 12 o'clock Thursday morning a sharp shock of earthquake was felt at Independence. Windows and doors were rattled and people awakened from sleep. There were three tremors and the motion seemed to be from west to east.

Stop It.

It has brought to our notice that a person has been writing anonymous letters, signing the name "Royoo." The letters contain base charges and insinuations, conveyed in a most cowardly manner. The recipient of the letters claims to know the identity of the writer, but from a natural delicacy does not desire the name made public. The writing of an anonymous letter is always a vile thing to do, even when the contents are based on truth; but when scurrilous abuse is presented in such a vile manner the writer is deserving of the utmost condemnation. We are requested to state that should the offense be repeated the name of the person will be made known and the writer held up to the public as a cowardly traducer of character, who resorts to the basest of means for wreaking a petty spite.

No Money For Coyotes.

On the joint petition of J. W. Ingram and E. P. Colgan, State Controller, the Supreme Court has rendered a decision on the question whether or not the Legislature, in passing the coyote bounty act, appropriated necessary funds to pay the claims for scalps. The objection to the payment of the claims was that the act made no appropriation for the purpose, and even if it had made appropriation as was held by the appellent Ingram, the appropriation was void because of the uncertainty as to the amount. This contention was sustained by the court. The language of the act was cited in support of the theory of the appellent. It is that $5 for each coyote destroyed shall be paid out of the general fund. The apparent designation of the general fund as the source from which the bounty was to be paid, was relied upon by the appellent to prove his claim that an appropriation was made. In expressing its opinion the court wrote as follows: "A promise by the government to pay money is not an apropriation. A duty on the part of the Legislature to make an appropriation is not such. A promise to make an appropriation is not an appropriation. Usage of paying money in the absence of an appropriation cannot make an appropriation for future payment. The utmost that can be claimed for the act under consideration is that it pledges the good faith of the State to the making of an appropriation. "For the reasons implied the writ of mandamus to compel the Controller to pay the claims, originally sued for by Ingram, has been dismissed." This practically destroys the bounty act, for by this decision it is made nothing more than the shadow of what was supposed to be a financial substance. Already large amounts have been paid, mostly in scrip, however, and what will be done with the paper is a pertinent question. The act itself is not destroyed, but it is like a law without a penalty for its violation. Hereafter, hunters can shoot all the coyotes they find under the promise of $5 for every one killed, but unless the Legislature makes a definite appropriation to settle such claims, the mere promise is as far as the State will go.

BEN F. HUDSPETH, Teacher.

After A Grizzly.

A. W. D. Carroll came up from Lone Pine on Thursday's stage. Mr. Carroll with John Taylor and Pete Laberge recently made a bear hunt in the Sierras west of Lone Pine. A few days ago Messrs Laberge and Taylor captured a grizzly cub near the Green ranch in the foothills west of Lone Pine and the hunt was organized for the purpose of finding the old bear. The party followed the tracks of the cub and eventually discovered the trail of the old one; but as it took them over the ridge, through deep snows, they became too much exhausted to follow it up. The cub escaped after a few days confinement and was found dead by a sheepman up in the canyon.

Another Match Made.

Another footrace has been arranged between Ed Ober and Tom Morris, to take place on Saturday, March 9th, at Independence. The articles of agreement were signed on Tuesday and a forfeit of $100 a side deposited, the race being for $500 a side. There has been considerable backing and filling between the two sprinters for several months past and the race will cause considerable interest. They were matched on a former occasion for the same amount, Morris forfeiting.

Developing A Good Property.

Supervisor Fitzgerald returned to Mdock last Monday after a week's stay at Independence, on business connected with the Snow's Canyon mine. Mr. Fitzgerald is working three eight-hour shifts a day opening up the mine owned by himself and Billy Smith. There is already a fine body of ore in sight, but no effort will be made towards milling until the property is thoroughly opened up and put in condition to work on a large scale.

Mrs. Bertrand Rhine will leave for Mojave on Monday's stage to meet her husband. They expect to go from there to Los Angeles for a short visit before returning home. Bert met with good success in disposing of his band of mutton sheep.

A NOBLE FIGHT.

An Eminent Southern Lawyer's Long Conflict With Disease.

Twenty-five Years of Prosperity, Adversity and Suffering. The Great Victory Won by science Over a Stubborn Disease.

(From the Atlanta, Ga., Constitution.)

Foremost among the best known lawyers and farmers of North Carolina stands Col. Isaac A. Sugg, of Greenville. Mr. Sugg has resided in Greenville 22 years. While nearly everyone in Pitt Co. knows Mr. S's history, perhaps all do not know of his return to business again after an illness of 16 years. No man has gone through more that he, and lived. It was a case of the entire breaking down of the nervous system, attended by excruciating, agonizing, unendurable pain. Opiates and stimulants only quieted temporarily, and all treatments failed him. Only his love of family and friends prevented suicide. He told a reporter the following interesting story:

"I kept at my work as long as I could but nature gave way at last and I succumed to the inevitable. My entire nervous system had been shattered by the stimulants and opiates I had taken, my blood had actually turned to water, my weight had dropped from 173 pounds to 123, and it seemed to everybody that the end was in sight. Why I could not bear the gentle hand of my wife to bathe my limbs with tepid water. I was simply living from hour to hour. I had made my will, settled my business and waited for the last strand of life to snap.

It was at this time that a somewhat similar case as my own was brought to my notice. This man had suffered very much as I had, his life had been despaired of as mine had and yet he had been cured. Think, what that little word meant to me—CURED. The report stated that the work had been accomplished by a medicine known as Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I investigated the report thoroughly and found that it was true in detail. Then I procured some of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and began taking them and began to get better. I began to sleep like a healthful child, sound, calm and peaceful. My appetite came back and, my nerves were soothed and restored to their normal condition and I felt like a new man. But the greatest blessing was the mental improvement. I began to read and digest, to formulate new plans, to take interest in my law practice, which began to come back to me as soon as my clients realized that I was again myself. After a lapse of 10 years I ride horse back every day without fatigue.

"That Dr. Williams' Pink Pills saved my life is beyond doubt, and I am spreading their praise far and wide."

Inquiry about the town of Greenville substantiated the above facts of Col. Sugg's case, and that many others are being benefited by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale by all druggists, or may be had by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., for 50c per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

Death's Bridal.

By DAVID KER.

"I do, indeed!" replied Percival emphatically; "but if there is anything whatever that I can do for you, short of betraying my trust by letting you go, I'll do it, come what may!"

"Nothing," said the other, "but let me write a letter, and have it sent to its address."

"I understand. Of course I have your word not to attempt an escape if I untie your hands?"

"You have," said the prisoner simply; and Percival, unbinding his arms, handed him a small pocketbook with a pencil in it and then stepped aside, leaving the doomed man to write his last words unwatched.

"They were soon written, and the young southerner, taking the note, bound the prisoner's arms once more, and then, looking for a moment at his old friend with a paler face than the brave man had ever worn amid the hottest fire of the Federal batteries, strode fiercely out of the shed without a word of farewell.

"Thank God!" muttered Fortescue, as the door closed behind him, "she will at least know that I was true to the last!"

But it seemed fated that Arthur's firmness should be tried to the utmost; for hardly had this agitating scene ended when it was succeeded by another experience more trying still.

"The fellers say," remarked one of the two sentinels to his comrade, "that thar's a gal somewhar 'round peddlin' fruit and white bread, with a nigger to help her. I wish she'd come down our way, for I feel as holler as a dead log!"

"You bet that's jest how I feel too," said the other; "and if she's got any whisky among her truck I reckon I'd give every cent I've got for a taste of it—and that ain't sayin' much, nuther."

The hungry soldiers appeared to have the luck of the hero of a fairy tale, for their wish was hardly spoken when they saw the figure of a woman coming slowly toward them through the fast falling shadows of night, carrying a small basket, while a negro bore a larger one behind her. They hailed her, and as she answered them Arthur Fortescue started at the sound of a voice which he had never expected to hear again.

It was indeed Constance Leigh herself, accompanied by the trusty colored scout who had brought the news of Arthur's capture. Her assumed character was undoubtedly the best that she could have chosen, for in this region, where war had done its worst, the spectacle of a young lady of good southern family driven to support herself by selling bread of her own baking and fruit of her own raising, was nothing uncommon, and the presence of the negro, presumably an old family retainer, still true to her altered fortunes, was quite in keeping with this idea.

Not without a long and weary search (being, of course, compelled to proceed with the utmost caution) had they discovered Arthur's prison, and even now their task seemed well nigh hopeless. The sturdy frames and resolute faces of his two guards showed that they would not be easily overcome either by force or cunning, and even if he could be freed his rescuers would still have to get him and themselves out of the camp undetected.

Constance proffered her basket to the two soldiers, who, saluting her with rough respect, began to help themselves with a will. But suddenly the elder of the two checked himself, and said in an insinuating tone:

"Say, miss, yo hain't got a drop o' whisky, I s'pose, in that ar biggest basket o' your'n? If yo hev, we'd be powerful glad of a sight of it, you bet."

"But is it not forbidden to sell liquor to the sentries?" asked Constance with well feigned reluctance. "That officer whom I met just now told me so, I'm sure."

"Wal, maybe it ain't right squar' with the orders," admitted the man unwillingly, "but jest fer once in a way it wouldn't matter much, I reckon."

Just then the negro attendant, attracting the attention of the two men by a very expressive pantomime behind Constance's back, displayed the neck of a bottle from a leather pouch at his side, winked knowingly at the soldiers, who winked at him in return. Then, turning sharply around, he contrived to upset his basket and uttered a loud cry of dismay.

"Oh, golly, missy, all dem tings done tumble out! You wait lilly bit, me pick 'em up 'gain!"

"Do you think I'm going to wait for you, you clumsy fellow?" replied Constance sharply. "Don't you see it's getting dark, and we must make haste home again? I'll go slowly on, and you pick up the things and come after me as quick as you can."

The moment her back was turned the negro handed the concealed bottle to the nearest soldier with a sly grin, hastily pouched his money, and bundling the scattered provisions recklessly into his basket, hurried after his young mistress.

"That's derned good stuff," said the first soldier, taking a hearty pull, "though it has a queer sort o' taste, someways."

"That's so," assented the other, drinking in turn; "but I reckon good whisky's wuth hevin', if thar was p'ison in it."

There was something unusual in it beyond a doubt, for before long first one man and then the other began to grow drowsy and leaned heavily against the side of the shed, roused himself with a sudden start, and then let fall his rifle and sank to the ground in a dead sleep.

Up came gliding in a trice the dark figure of the negro scout, who had gone no farther than the nearest clump of bushes, and asked softly:

"You dere, Marse Joliffe?"

"Is that you, Zeke?" said the prisoner.

"Dat me, sure 'nuff. You wait one minute. Me get you out."

Zeke soon found a spot close to the earth where the crazy planking, rotted by constant rain, was easy to cut through. Upon this he went to work, for the bar of the door defied his strength, one of the wary sentinels having jammed it by forcing a large stone into the socket.

The brave man hacked away as if working for his life, which indeed he was; for if fresh men came up to relieve guard while he was thus employed he would share the doom of the man whom he was striving to save. Again and again he thought he heard approaching steps, but happily it was only his fancy, and at length the moldering wood gave way. The young viscount crawled forth, and the lovers were instantly in each other's arms.

"Whether I live or die, darling, I've seen you again," said Arthur, kissing her, "and nothing can deprive me of that. Now, Zeke, what are we to do?"

"You put on dat uniform, Marse Joe," answered the negro, hastily stripping the unconscious men of their tattered gray uniforms, "and Missy put on dis yer 'un. Den you two take dem two rifles and march me off troo de camp; and if anybody ask whar you gwine tell 'em you done cotch dis cussed nigger sell liquor to sentry, got order see him clar out ob de lines."

It was a bold and hazardous scheme, but there seemed to be no other way of escape. The shed served Constance as a dressing room, and, being naturally tall, she made a very passable soldier, with the broad hat slouched well over her face. Zeke bundled the discarded clothing into his basket, and away they went.

Favored by the darkness, they got along more easily than they had expected. Twice they were stopped and questioned, but, having picked up the countersign, that and the excuse suggested by Zeke carried them through, and they were soon clear of the Confederate lines.

"Thank God," said Constance fervently, "we are safe at last."

But unhappily she was rejoicing too soon. Just then a storm of wind and rain burst upon them, making the night so dark that neither Arthur nor Zeke, though two of the best scouts in the Union army, could tell which way to turn, especially as they were now involved in a maze of thickets that would have been puzzling even in broad daylight.

Happily a thick tree was at hand to offer them shelter, and Constance, wrapped in her companions' coats and the canvas cover of Zeke's basket, fell asleep from sheer exhaustion, while the young viscount, seated by her side, listened to her soft breathing and built many a castle in the air for that future from which, only a few hours before, he had thought himself cut off forever.

Hour after hour went by in silence, but toward morning Arthur's quick ear caught a strange, dull sound far in the distance, growing gradually louder, and he guessed at once that some important movement was in progress. And so it proved, for day had hardly dawned when a roll of drums was heard to the northward, and Zeke, raising his head to listen, said:

"Marse Joe, you and missy better put on you own clothes 'gain and chuck dem soger tings away. Dem rebs no trouble us now, for dey soon hab something else to think ob, shuah, dan cotchin' we uns. Dat drum mean Marse Grant and Marse Sherman comin' out to whip 'em."

It soon appeared that he was right. While they were snatching a hasty meal from what was left of the contents of Zeke's basket, the rolling of the drums kept growing louder and nearer; and they had not gone far on their way toward the town, after changing their clothes again, as their guide had suggested, when the warlike concert was swelled by another sound—viz., a deepening roar of cannon that made the air tremble.

The great battle of Lookout mountain had begun.

It was not long before a sudden turn brought them full in view of the scene of action. Sherman's troops had already begun their attack upon Missionary Ridge, and a vast blue wave of assault was surging up against the steep face of the hill, while the morning sun broke in countless sparkles upon thousands of bayonets. All along the higer slopes the dark masses of the Confederates clustered like bees, and from the somber gray cloud broke ever and anon the flash and thunder of the death dealing cannon.

But grand as the sight was, the fugitives had no time to dwell upon it, for they were now well within the range of the Confederate guns. Shot and shell kept falling all around them, crashing through the bushes or tearing up the ground, and all three felt inwardly relieved when a few minutes later they found themselves in a deep, narrow lane between two high banks, which effectually shielded them from the flying balls.

Unhappily it was no protection against the shells, one of which suddenly fell within a few yards of them, and Arthur Fortescue had barely time to throw himself before his betrothed when the shell exploded, and they were both struck to the ground.

The girl was on her feet again in a moment, unhurt save a few slight bruises, but her lover lay motionless on the earth, with a thin stream of blood oozing through a wide rent in the breast of his coat.

CHAPTER V.

DEATH'S BRIDAL.

"Send for a clergyman and let us be married before I die."

"All up wid he, missy," said the brave negro, looking sadly down on the prostrate form of his old comrade. "Nebber die Joe done gone dead at last!"

"He's not dead, and he shall not die!" cried Constance impetuously, as she threw herself on her knees beside the fallen man. "Yes, I can feel his heart beating. Help me to carry him to the town; we will save him yet!"

While she was speaking she had torn off her scarf and used it to check the bleeding as well as she could. In doing so several pieces of broken glass and metal fell into her hands, and she recognized, with a smile of triumph even in that moment of agony, the fragments of her own miniature.

Scorpions.

The natives of Lucca, in Italy, assert that the scorpion will destroy itself if exposed to a sudden light, and a writer in Nature said that his informant and her friends, while residing during the summer months at the baths of Lucca, were much annoyed by the intrusion of small black scorpions into the house and their being secreted among the bedclothes, in shoes and in other articles of dress; that they soon became adepts in catching the scorpions and disposing of them in the manner suggested. "This consisted in confining the animal under an inverted drinking glass or tumbler below which a card was inserted when the capture was made and then waiting till dark, suddenly bringing the light of a candle near to the glass in which the animal was confined. No sooner was this done than the scorpion invariably showed signs of great excitement, running round and round the interior of the tumbler with reckless velocity for a number of times.

"This state having lasted for a minute or more, the animal suddenly became quiet, and turning its tail, or the hinder part of its body, over its back, brought its recurved sting down upon the middle of the head, and piercing it forcibly in a few seconds became quite motionless, and, in fact, quite dead. This observation was repeated very frequently—in truth, it was adopted as the best plan of getting rid of the pests, and the young people were in the habit of handling them with impunity immediately after they were so killed and of preserving many of them as curiosities." It is known that scorpions kill themselves when surrounded by a ring of fire.

Safeguards Against Cholera.

The practical question which concerns us in this country is the danger to which we are exposed. This is not very great. In the first place the fact of the existence of the disease is known, and in such matters to be forewarned is emphatically to be forearmed. Second, the period of incubation of cholera is very short, being from a few hours to three days. Consequently should any person infected board one of the ships coming here the disease would manifest itself before the arrival of the vessel. The advantage of this is obvious—no vessel could arrive here with cholera on board without the quarantine physicians finding or hearing of cases. The outbreak of typhus which occurred in this city some months ago was produced by people who, owing to the long incubation of typhus, passed quarantine while apparently well.

Of course the germs might come here in rags, but the chances that rags have of passing without disinfection are extraordinarily small nowadays. As water and food are the carriers of the germs, it follows that these must be carefully watched should the disease find a lodgment here. It is most fortunate that the cholera bacillus can neither stand heat nor cold. A few days of sharp frost will stamp an epidemic of the disease out. Food must be eaten while hot and fresh from the fire, and water in cholera times must be boiled.—Cyrus Edson, M. D., in North American Review.

A Summer Diversion.

A broker, who is well known on the Stock exchange for his proclivities as a practical joker, made considerable fun for some of his associates last week. He is sojourning in the country at present and dispensing hospitality to numbers of his comrades. He is rated among them as a particularly bad marksman, and so it was that when he took a number of them around back of the barn a few mornings since and showed them a target painted on the back of the barn and a bullet imbedded in the very center of the bullseye the first inquiry was:

"Who fired the shot?"

"I fired it, and from a distance of 200 yards, too," was his earnest reply.

"Oh, rats, rats!"

"Come off, now."

"You could not hit the barn at that distance."

But he persisted in his assertion and finally suggested that perhaps some of his friends would like to bet on it. He got two bets, one for a dinner for the crowd and another for a case of champagne. He then brought two witnesses who solemnly declared that they had seen the shot fired by him from a distance of two hundred yards, and from a rifle. The witnesses were beyond suspicion and the bets were paid.

During the jubilee that followed the broker confessed that he had painted the target on the barn after he had fired the shot.—New York Herald.

The Pottery Tree of Para.

One of the curiosities of Brazil is a tree whose wood and bark contain so much silica that they are used by potters. Both wood and bark are burned, and the ashes are pulverized and mixed in equal proportions with clay, producing a very superior ware. The tree grows to a height of 100 feet, but does not exceed a foot in diameter. The fresh bark cuts like sandstone, and when dried is brittle and hard.—Demorest Magazine.

NOT MUCH.

Not much to give, a cup of water, yet its draught of cool refreshment drained by fevered lips will send more pleasure through the frame than when the juice of wine renews the joys of brighter days; not much to buy, a bottle of St. Jacobs Oil, yet rubbed well on lumbago's twisting pains, will straighten up and cure more crooked backs than when the boys march forth on holiday parade. Not much to try it, anyway; for in all its world-wide mission to comfort those in pain, it never yet deceived; so that its name, like household words, is known to be remembered. It's the external wine of joy.

How Porcelain Was Discovered.

Although porcelain was know to both the Chinese and Japanese for ages, it was not introduced into Europe until the beginning of the eighteenth century, when John Bottcher, a native of Schlaiz in Voightland was the first to make it. This man was apprentice to a Berlin apothecary named Zorn, in whose shop he conferred some favor upon a professed alchemist, who in return promised to teach him the art of transmuting the baser metals into gold. Bottcher, after studying under his new master for a time, imagined that his fortune was made, and in 1700 he ran away. He was pursued, but found protection among friends, who demanded to witness an exhibition of his pretended skill, and the poor fellow was eventually compelled to acknowledge that he had been imposed upon.

But he persevered in his labors, and on one occasion, having made a mixture of various finely organized earths for the purpose of making strong crucibles, he discovered after he had taken the compound mass from the oven that he had gained a kind of pottery more beautiful than he had ever seen. The transmutation, it may therefore be said, took place not in the metals indeed, but in his own person, for Bottcher was suddenly changed from an alchemist to a potter. In 1706 the first porcelain was thus manufactured in Dresden. Being made of colored clay it presented a light brownish red hue, but as early as 1709 a beautiful white porcelain was obtained, and its manufacture was fully established during the following years.—Boston Herald.

The Effect of the Thermometer.

It was a very hot day, and grandpa made repeated visits to the piazza to note the state of the thermometer. Little Helen always trudged along with him and listened very attentively when grandpa explained to her about the thermometer. Late in the afternoon grandpa said, "Well, it has gone down; it is a shade cooler." A few moments later Helen said to grandma, "It's surprising, grandma, how tool it is since that fermometer went down."—Youth's Companion.

Walking Is an Inexpensive Panacea.

Walking, the best of all exercises for the well, because the most natural, should be a duty, just as are eating, drinking or sleeping, and the cares and supposed duties of the home should be laid aside until it has been enjoyed. Within a prescribed circle, dwelling upon unworthy cares oftentimes, allowing duties to magnify until they become curses, dwarfing the soul to gain a passing show for the body—these are the things that women indulge in too often. Physical exercise, open doors and plenty of air are the panacea for all these ills.—Exchange.

GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY

Many years ago Dr. R. V. Pierce, chief consulting physician to the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., compounded this medicine of vegetable ingredients which had an especial effect upon the stomach and liver, rousing the organs to healthful activity as well as purifying and enriching the blood. By such means the stomach and the nerves are supplied with pure blood; they will not do duty without it any more than a locomotive can run without coal. You can not get a lasting cure of Dyspepsia, or Indigestion, by taking artificially digested foods or pepsin—the stomach must do its own work in its own way. Do not put your nerves to sleep with so-called celery mixtures, it is better to go to the seat of the difficulty and feed the nerve cells on the food they require. Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Biliousness and Nervous Affections, such as sleeplessness and weak, nervous feelings are completely cured by the "Discovery." It puts on healthy flesh, brings refreshing sleep and invigorates the whole system.

MRS. K. HENKE, of No. 896 North Halsted St., Chicago, Ill., writes: "I regard my improvement as simply wonderful. Since taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery in connection with his 'Pleasant Pellets' I have gained in every respect, particularly in flesh and strength. My liver was dreadfully enlarged and I suffered greatly from dyspepsia. No physician could give relief. Now, after two months I am entirely relieved of my disease. My appetite is excellent; food well digested; bowels regular and sleep much improved."

World's Fair HIGHEST MEDAL awarded to Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder

The highest award was given on every claim, comprising superiority in leavening power, keeping properties, purity and excellence. This verdict has been given by the best jury ever assembled for such a purpose, backed by the recommendation of the Chief Chemist of the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., who made an elaborate examination and test of all the baking powders. This is pre-eminently the highest authority on such matters in America.

This verdict conclusively settles the question and proves that Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is superior in every way to any other brand.

NOTE.—The Chief Chemist rejected the Alum baking powders, stating to the World's Fair jury that he considered them unwholesome.

The Agricultural Department has so far sent out 1,300,000 papers of vegetable seeds. The work will not be completed before May. There are still about 6,000,000 papers of seeds awaiting distribution.

THE HOBO'S.

A Remedy is Suggested for Their Suppression.

BIG ROCK PILES AND CHAIN GANGS.

An Interesting Account of the Life of a Hobo--Their Language Understood Only by Themselves.

In various parts of the State the local officials are attempting to suppress the rough element, or, in the language of the day, hobos, who make it a point to do as little work as possible and become a nuisance to the community which they infest. The word hobo has a meaning, but few if any understand its significance and it will require space to determine at length the true meaning.

In conversation with a prominent mining man of San Francisco who has experienced the ups and downs of life in all its phases, some interesting information was obtained by a San Francisco "Bulletin" reporter, when inquiry was made of the mining man as to his idea of a remedy to suppress the hobo element.

At first the mining man was inclined to pass the matter lightly by and refused to converse. When informed that he was known to have associated with the hobo element and had beaten his way from New York to this city, his ideas changed, and he admitted that while hard luck had overtaken himself and partner in many ways he was now in a position to give his opinion freely and frankly, with the understanding that his name or that of his partner should not be published.

"What shall we do with the hobo element?" he was asked.

"Well, while I know what I would do, it is a question that is bothering a great many more people than myself. I will tell you a story of my experience and the readers of your paper can draw their own conclusions.

"I have, with my partner, beat my way from New York to San Francisco (as far as railroad fare is concerned), but in all my travels, and at times we were hard pushed, I found no trouble in securing work enough to pay for our food, and, furthermore, could have had work all winter at $1.20 per day and board at one place.

"Nine-tenths of the men on the road to-day," continued the speaker, and there was evidence of his sincerity, "do not want work unless it is at wages that are not obtainable in the country.

"My candid and honest opinion is that the only way for cities to do is to have a good big rock pile and set the hobo to work as soon as he enters the town. Breaking rock is foreign to the ideas of a hobo, and as soon as he learns of its existence he makes himself scarce. With the assistance of a rock pile and a chain-gang the hobos not only make themselves self-supporting but perform excellent work on the streets.

"It can be done beyond the question of a doubt, and the sooner the idea is carried out the better will the community of each city be off. As an example, I am satisfied that if the idea was perpetuated you would find in less than six months that the hobos would look for honest work instead of 'taking to the road.' The rock-pile would reduce the number of men on the road to one-tenth of the number to-day.

"It may seem to you that I am hard on a class of people that I have traveled with and slept with and eat with, but I venture to assert that if you were to start a man from San Francisco to beat his way to New York the class of people that he would meet with along the line would make him the lowest thief in the country before he even reached Chicago.

"The hobo element of to-day is as much of a profession as any line of business in the world. None of the class of people of whom I speak, have any trouble to recognize one another, and about the first thing you hear on entering a camp (and every Eastern town has a hobo camp), is, 'Are you a hobo or are you a yag?' If a yag, you will find the places you can get a good meal at and those who are good for coin. The hobos have names for everything and everybody. You would hardly understand a word of the hobo language as conversed, and to illustrate what I mean I will give you a few samples.

"Conductors on the railroad trains are known as the 'main shack,' and the brakeman is the 'shack'; a priest is known as 'Galway' and is always considered good for five meals in the morning. Many times I have known the priests to give from 50 cents to $2 to hobos, and while it might have been considered a charitable act on the part of the representative of the church, I have never known a man in a hobo camp that was deserving of the consideration shown.

"In proof of this statement I publicly assert that any money given to parties on the street who approach you is a shame and shows poor judgment in the minds of honest people, who are apt to be led by a glib tongue. I assure you that in the vast majority of cases when you are approached on the street and money is asked for, on the plea that it is to get something to eat, the party is too lazy to go to a house and ask for it, and he does not want the money for the purpose he says, but for either drink or something else he should not have.

"Although I have roughed it, I dare say that during my life I have given as much money away on the street for what I considered charity as any other man that has always worked for what he had. To-day if a man asks me for coin so that he can procure a meal, I will ask him a few questions, and if I think the man is hungry I will take him to some place where he can get the most for 15 cents; but he does not get a cent in coin. If it is done, a mistake is made. Should your house be visited and a good big pile of wood needs cutting, it is advisable to set the applicant at work. In a few days, if you want it cut up, you will find that you have to do it yourself, or pay some one else to perform the labor.

"The house that makes hobos work for what they get will be avoided. All of them are known and in every camp the subject is thoroughly discussed. The hobos know more about the country than those who travel in Pullman cars. I have traveled East from San Francisco to New York five times and until I struck my streak of hard luck, always traveled in a Pullman. The one trip of roughing it, however, has given me more information of the country than I learned in the five trips traveling first-class.

"On the entire trip from New York to San Francisco myself and partner never begged a single meal and always had money to pay for what we ate.

"The trouble is, people have too much of what they consider sympathy.

As long as they give to men calling at the houses and asking for money on the street, just so long the hobos will increase. I started to tell some of the expressions they use.

"A man that don't beg but pays for his food is called a 'gay cat.' I remember now of one or two expressions that bothered me for a time at first.

"I was in the yard at Chamois, Mo., looking for a freight and ran into a man. Thinking it was a 'bull' (policeman), I attempted to pass him, when he said: 'Did you see a yag going down the track with one lamp and a flat wheel?,' I told him I did not quite understand what he meant. 'Why,' said he, 'one eye and a wooden leg.'

"The hobos pride themselves on their expressions and the more you can talk with them the better you can travel.

"Another important point is the class that comes on the train at junctions and stations. No doubt many of your readers who have traveled have noticed boys come on the train, and in some cases apparently cripples. I have seen several of them, and do not know of a case that the alleged cripple was not as well as I was. They have men that they are working for. One case I remember now was at Rincon, N. M. There were seven men in camp, every one of them with a boy; some with their hands done up, and others on crutches. The cripples (?) collected from 50 cents to as high as $3.85 from trains that arrive there about 9 a. m., and about one-half as much from the evening train.

The hobos all register at the time they leave the camp, on some water tank usually, such as the following:

"Seldom seen; 9-12-94, W." (going west); if it is "E." it means going east, and if an "X." it is an ex-convict (and there are several of them on the road).

"The hobos have no trouble in traveling and think no more of starting for a 1,000-mile trip than one would to go to Oakland. The favorite way is to 'spring a car.' They take a fish plate and spring the back end of a car door and get in and have some one spring it back—taking, of course, a fish-plate with them to spring themselevs out. I have seen them break open all kinds of canned goods and they will overhaul a whole car for tobacco. The expense to the railroad companies is beyond calculation. There are camps to-day that burn from one-half to one and one-half tons of coal per night, and I have known the hobo in one week on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe to burn 1,200 ties in one week. The railroad officials are powerless to handle them. I have seen one conductor killed and one hobo wounded. On the trip I observed one of the brakemen coolly fire two shots at a fellow riding a brake-beam.

"Thirty-eight hobos took a train at the A. P. junction, and out of the entire crowd not more than two of them were looking for work.

"I could continue to tell you sights I have seen among the hobos, and I will venture to say if you had seen what I have you would change as I have in regard to the hobos. But at the same time something has got to be done and the idea of a rock pile will undoubtedly fill the bill.

"El Paso, Texas, Silver City, N. M., Albuquerque, N. M., and Kansas City have little interest for hobos, as a good big rock-pile awaits them, and, in consequence, the community is not troubled by vagrants who profess to want work, but would not work if they had the chance."

Other expressions of the hobos are as follows:

School house—Knowledge boxes.

Yag—A person who will not work for what he eats.

Gay cat—A person who pays for what he eats and beats the railroad companies.

Kicking a crib for strides—Entering a shoe store and carrying off footwear.

Working the main stem—Seeking assistance on the main street.

Sloughed—Working in chain-gang.

Lifting a gooseberry—Stealing a clothesline with the clothes.

Pot-Gang—A camp of fifteen or twenty hobos, who "work" different places for varieties of food and all share alike when it is cooked.

Hand out—Receiving something to eat in a bundle.

Set-down—Invited to sit at a table to eat; chances to steal excellent.

Word has been received that the Everet smelter has closed, leaving the Tacoma smelter the only one in operation north of San Francsico and west of Helena. Lack of ores to mix with Monte Cristo ores is said to have caused the shut-down at Everett. Six weeks ago the smelter there was started for the third time since it was finished two years ago.

HAWKS IN DEMAND.

Falconry is Revived by the European Aristocracy.

THE KAISER WILHELM'S LATE FAD.

Birds with Grotesque Movements on Terra Firma, but who Beat Anything on the Wing.

A wise rabbi once said to his pupils, "All things return." Falconry has returned in the world of sport on the eve of the twentieth century. Patrician hunters will herefter scorn double barreled shotguns and fin de siecle equipments and wild bipeds and quabrupeds will be captured in mediæval fashion by means of trained falcons

The fad is already prevalent in many parts of England, and Emperor William has given the initiation in Germany, enthusiastic over the sport in which he indulged with his relatives in British forests. There never was time when falconry was not in vogue in England even during the latter part of this century, catering to a number of English lords and ladies. Some enterprising trainers have found it a remunerative business to conduct a falcon farm in the little Flemish village, Falkenwerth. The Royal family of the netherlands also maintained the falcon hunt on the grounds of the Loo Castle until the year 1845.

The hawk was utilized very early in man's history in the capture of game, so that hawking or falconry is perhaps as primitive as the bow and arrow. China records this sport practiced as early as 2000 B. C., and in high favor during the reign of King Wen Wang, 689 B. C. In Japan, India, Arabia, Syr and among the Asiatic tribes of Asiatic Russia the falconer occurs fully as early in history and poetry. Sir A H. Layard, in his work on "Nineveh and Babylon," speaks of finding a bas relief in Korsbad on which is represented a falconer bearing a hawk on his wrist. And to the present day the inhabitants of Northern and Middle Asia and of the remotest quarters of the Orient have retained the sport, where they have taught the hawks to capture large mammals—antelopes, foxes, and even porcupines. How the hawk is able to grapple with the barbed hide on an angry porcupine is not easily understood, but it is certain that he can be taught to accomplish some wonderful feats.

Africa also furnishes records of falconry in the early history of its swarthy nations, where, especially in Egypt, judging from the recently exhumed carvings, it is certainly very ancient. It is surmised that Europeans first learned the art of falcon training from the Berbers, Moors, and Tunesians. It is also a fact that hawking is a favorite sport to this day in most of the northern states of Africa.

According to Pliny and Aristotle, whose reports are somewhat vague, however, the Roman nobles indulged in hawking two or three centuries before the Christian era, to whom it was taught by the Thracians. Charlemange instituted certain legal enactments for the maintenance of this branch of hunting. To the plebian serf it was forbidden "to hunt with birds.' The Emperors Frederick I and Frederick II were expert hawkers.

In France la fauconnerie gained such a prominence that under the reign of King Francis I it was found expedient to appoint a falcon master-in-chief in the royal chase, who commanded fifteen noblemen and fifty falconers, who controlled 300 trained hawks.

Woe to the culprit who was convicted in the time of Edward III of England of stealing a hawk! He seldom escaped the death penalty, and a long term of imprisonment was the fate of anyone pilfering eggs from the falcon nests.

In Germany the falkenjagd flourished to such an extent during and after the middle ages that the grand master of the German Knight orders caused a so-called falakonier anstalt to be erected in Prussia in 1396, an example which was soon followed in the southern states.

The decline of the sport, and with it the gradual disappearance of many knightly arts and virtues, may be traced to the reformation and to the subsequent international and religious wars, and, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of certain French noblemen at the beginning of the eighteenth century, it never regained its former prominence, while among the cultured nations of Asia it continued to prevail, though with them it has never assumed the character of a sport.

Hawks to be trained for the hunt must be less than 3 years old, and these must be the offspring of captive or domesticated birds. The species best adapted for this purpose is known in Germany as "edelfalken." They are more compactly built than the sparrow and prairie hawks, their heads are larger, with prominent tooth and notch of bill, their eyes are bright and sharpsighted, unprotected by brows or eyelid hairs, and their wings are pointed and often the size of a large eagle's. On terra firma their movements are grotesque and awkard. But few winged animals can beat them in rapidity and ease of flight. It is astonishing to see how long these birds can remain poised apparently motionless in midair.

Now, how are these irrational creatures taught to capture game for their masters? What fits the falcon or hawk for the work more than any other birds is their pugilistic propensities, their enormous appetite, their high flight and remarkable sharpsightedness. To rear them for the chase a skillful falconer is required who is possessed of angelic patience. Such a trainer will change his tactics in accordance with the temper, disposition, and constitution of his aviary pupils. In this repsect birds are like children—some are apt and sanguine, others slow and stubborn, but the latter often prove in the end to be the most reliable in the pursuit of prey. Trainers and hunters are obliged to wear gauntlets or heavy leather gloves to protect their wrists, on which the birds are perched with their sharp, muscular talons. The first stage in the long and tedious training process consists of starving them at interavals until they learn to bate and eat only at the command of his master. (A hawk is said to bate when she flutters off from the fish perch or block, whether from wildness or for exercise or in the attempt to chase.) For several days the falcon is hooded and made to feed occasionally from a beefsteak drawn over her talon, when she is stroked with a feather to represent the presence of winged prey. At each meal the trainer makes a peculiar sound, to teach her the time for feeding. After this a different hood, leaving the eyes exposed, is used, which must be placed on her head in a dark room. The trainer continues his starving and feeding process, gradually admitting more and more light, and hooding and unhooding his bird at will. Then follows an outdoor course of training in the presence of strangers, horses, dogs, etc., and then the bill of fare includes live and dead pigeons and small birds. Finally she is permitted to join some veterans in the field and made acquainted with the lure, learning meanwhile to depend for her food entirely upon her trainer, going short distances after quarry while held by a leash, and returning to the fish when ever called. Soon after this she is dispatched after small game, in the capture of which she will finally excel most marksmen with their guns. The eyrie of Falkenwerth, Belgium, has some expert specimens. There is a wide difference in the serviceable qualities of these birds. Some are good "footers," that is good at catching and killing, others again are good flyers and poor footers. The pitch of some, that is the height to which they can fly, sometimes beats the eagle's. When hawkers indulge in a pitch contest, jealousy will often make them forget their masters below, and then will follow a promiscuous battle on high, resulting in broken wings, bleeding beaks, talons, etc. As a rule, however, a falcon cannot be induced to trust her own species, and her own talons usually contain palatable dainties not much injured by the aerial combat.

Marco Polo says in his Milione that the great Khan of the Tartars "took with him full 3,000 falconers and good 500 ger-falcons, with falcons peregyrne and falcons sacre in great abundance; also he had a great number of goshawks for fowling along the water. In his Della Economia Politica del M die Evo Cibrario, the Italian historian, gives the following interesting description of the ancient sport: "The time of the chase was either early in the morning or toward evening. The sportsmen rode out with their falcons resting upon their strongly gloved wrists. When a bird was discovered suited to the nature and the habits of the falcon, the little hood which covered its eyes was drawn off and the falcon rose in rapid circles high above its destined prey; but if the latter was a large and powerful bird, formidable in beak and wing, the falcon was cautious and cunning in her advances, turned and wheeled with great dexterity, seizing only the favorable moment to strike. Having secured the prize, she swept in large circles over the head of the falconer, and finally presented him the booty. The falconer placed it in the game bag, and then set before his falcon the food prepared for her. Falcons which soared high and pursued birds of lofty flight were called altani; others took a lower, but more extended range, some were for the inland country, others for aquatic birds. These last were assisted by dogs; when, for example, a flock of herons is discovered the falconer approaches them secretly and suddenly beats a drum before the herons can get sight of the falcon, otherwise they would not dare to rise. Frightened by the drum, they take to flight; then the sportsman lets loose his falcon, and while she prepares to seize the herons in the air, the barking of the dogs prevents the poor birds from hiding again in the water. Eagles and falcons of the largest species may be trained for this chase, and they will even take foxes and hares."

While in Europe knights took their ladies on the falcon hunt, conducting it mainly for sport and amusement, and furishing poets and fiction writers with themes of love and bravery. The Orientals did not look upon it as a pastime, but with many it is to this day the most expedient means of procuring game, retaining their birds to attack formmidable antagonists, even risking the loss of valuable and trustworthy falcons.—Mail and Express.

AMERICAN CITIES 100 YEARS AGO.

When Washington was inaugurated Philadelphia, then the metropolis of the country, had only about 42,000 people, New York but 33,000, Boston 18,000, Baltimore 13,000, and no other city anywhere near 10,000. Even after the lapse of half a century, during which New York had overtaken Philadelphia, so that in 1840 it had 312,000 inhabitants to the latter city's 258,000, Baltimore and New Orleans were the only other places with more than 100,000 people, and except Boston with 93,000, all of the few remaining cities fell short of 50,000. During the formative period of the new nation, therefore, all but the merest fraction of its citizens lived in places of small population, the local affairs of which were easily administered through town meetings or other such simple machinery.—N. Y. Evening Post.

PAY YOUR TAX.

Internal Revenue Collector Prepares to Collect it.

POINTED QUERIES AND PENALTIES.

Returns That Must be Made by Corporations and Individuals--Work for the Lawyers.

Despite Senator Hill's efforts to block the collection of the income tax as inquisitorial and unjust by cutting off the funds necessary to enforce it, the Internal Revenue Department has been preparing to collect the tax, and Collector Welburn and his chief deputy, Louis Lange, have been for the past two weeks studying up "the regulations and law relative to income taxes" supplied by the Treasury Department. Judging from the appearances of the regulation there is lots of work ahead for the legal fraternity.

The Internal Revenue Collector has been sizing up the prospects and quite a number of prominent citizens of San Francisco opposite whose names the directory has the word capitalist will be invited to fill out the blanks that will have an important part in determining the amount they shall contribute toward wiping out Secretary Carlisles' monthly Treasury deficiency.

Inquiry elicited the fact that the forms upon which the returns are to be made have not arrived yet, though the Secreatry of the Treasury is having 300,000 of them printed for distribution among the sixty-three collectors, who have received a hint to see that all who should do so shall pay their quota to Uncle Sam.

It is said the size of the force to be entrusted with the task will depend upon the amount Congress concludes to appropriate for carrying on the work. The law, however, provides that everybody with an income above a certain amount shall make the return, taking the initiative. It must be filed before the first Monday of March with the Collector or Deputy Collector of the district in which the fortunate possessor of a comfortable income of $3,500 a year resides. In case of a failure to make the required return within the limited time, the Collector must fill up the necessary blank and by way of a penalty add 50 per cent. to the amount of the tax.

In the blanks for individuals the lucky or unlucky capitalist, as the case may be, must set forth the gross profits from business, rents, profits of real estate sales and farming operations, money and personal property inherited, premium on bonds, stocks, notes or coupons, income from profession or trade, salary, interest on notes and mortgages, dividends on stock, income of wife or minor children, and from all soucres not specially enumerated.

Deductions are next to be made to arrive at the amount on which the tax is chargeable. They are $4,000 exempt by law, interest paid, national, State, county, school or municipal taxes, expenditures for live stock or produce, expenses of business, losses in trade on sales of real estate, debts ascertained to be worthless, salary, compensation or pay over $4,000 from which the tax of 2 per centum has been deducted by any paymaster, disbursing officer or any other person in the employ of the United States, and dividends received from corporations, companies or associations on which the tax of 2 per centum has been paid by such corporation. These deductions having been made, determines the size of the captialists' taxable income for the year 1894.

Then, adding insult to injury, the capitalist is called upon to answer a few pointed queries, such as: Had your wife or any minor child any income last year. Have you included such in the return? Have you kept books of account and taken your estimates therefrom? What are the particular items of losses and when did each occur? How did you determine the debts worthless could not be collected? What are the necessary expenses included in the deductions?

All the facts above set forth must be sworn to, and "pillars of churches" are expected to steer clear of perjury, if they can, in setting forth the facts demanded by the Internal Revenue Department.

Copious extracts from the law and instructions for officials are printed on the backs of the blanks.

The instructions relative to computing incomes for taxation particularly point out that expenses for medical attendance, store accounts, family supplies, wages of domestic servants, cost of board, room or house rent for family or personal use, are not expenses that can be deducted from the gross profits or income in making annual returns. It was manifestly the legislative intention that the $4,000 exempt from the payment of the income tax should cover these expenses and all personal expenses for the maintenance of the family and household.

There is another special blank for corporations, but it is expected that the collections of the tax from these will be easier than from individuals, particularly those possesed of goodly sized incomes and elastic consciences. However, the collection of the tax depends in a great measure upon the Congressional appropriation and whether Congress passes the items providing for it. The greatest trouble apprehended is to get the persons who are liable for it.

Separate Government books must be kept by corporations, in which all transactions must be entered from day to day in regular order. If necessary the Collector can secure an inspection of all the books of a corporation or company where it is believed a true return of the income has not been made. If obstacles are thrown in the way of the Collector he can impose the penalty. The Collector is empowered to summon corporation officers before him with the books, and from the facts gleaned under oath may make the tatement of income, adding the prescribed penalty.

The penalty for neglecting to make the necessary return is 50 per cent. In all cases of a willfully false return having been rendered the collector must add 100 per cent. as a penalty to the amount of tax ascertained to be due.

The exempt corporations are: States, counties or municipalities, charitable, religious or educational corporations and fraternal organizations, the securities held by trustees for similar purposes, building or loan associations making loans only to shareholders, certain savings banks and mutual insurance companies.

Non-residents may receive the benefit of exemptions by filling the necessary return, but in case of a failure to do so the Collector shall collect the tax on the income derived from the property of such non-resident, making no allowance for exemption.

Officials gleaning information regarding incomes must observe secrecy, for Section 3,167 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, provides that it shall be unlawful for any collector or deputy to divulge to any person the amount, or source of income, profits, losses or expenditures set forth or disclosed in any income return. It is even made unlawful to print or publish such information.

The new law is bound to provide work for the lawyers, and many may find it profitable to secure legal advices in filling out the blanks. In case of a dispute, the capitalist can appeal to the Collector, whose ruling may also be reviewed by the Commisioner of Internal Revenue.

Treasury records show that the aggregate amount of all receipts from income taxes levied from 1863 to 1871, when the last Act was repealed, was $333,331,293, of which the corporations contributed $68,250,504.—S. F. Bulletin.

The latest hygenic craze in Paris is the use of porus glass for window. This is declared to possess all the advantages of the ordinary window framing, and while light is as freely admitted as through the medium of common glass, the "porous" further admits air, too, the minute holes with which this is intersected being too fine to permit of any draught, while they provide a healthy continuous ventilation through the apartment.—The Hospital.

William Brook of Paterson, N. J., according to Electricity, December 19th, intends to show all the uses to which electricity can be put. He is having a home built for himself, and expects to have it completed in a few weeks. He will apply electricity throughout his domicile. The house will be heated by electricity, the cooking will be done on an electric range, the house cooled in summer with electric fans; there will be a burglar alarm connecting with every part of the house, electric annunciators, and the whole, from cellar to garret, will be lighted by electricity. The house will be so arranged that should it be invaded by a burglar an alarm will be given to the family when on the floor above, and by means of a switch the whole lower part of the house can be flooded with light. Should the burglar attempt to escape from one room to another and out of the doors he will give the alarm by stepping on mats that will give notice of the intruder's movements and whereabouts.

It is not at all improbable that the century which has witnessed the subjugation of steam to the service of man with all the marvelous phases of material progress that have attended it, may also see the steam engine rank as a discarded invention. The process began with the interposition of the electric dynamo between the steam engine and the machinery to be moved; it will take a tremendous stride when it is demonstrated that power running to waste in Niagara Falls can be converted into electricity, and reconverted, two or three hundred miles from the primary motor, into light, heat or motion. The first step, apparently, to the laying aside of steam as a primary source of power is to connect with the water wheel, which steam displaced. Thus the age of steam may come to be reckoned a mere interlude, if not some What of a hinderance, in the process of scientific and mechanical evolution. For if the power of a cataract can be successfully transmuted into a more subtile power, capable of economical transmission over great distances, why not the power developed in the rise and fall of the tides? That is stopping very far short of the utilization of sunlight and is probably enough for one generation to accomplish. But in the experiments that go to the demonstration, first, of the scientific, and next, of the commercial possibility of such things, there is the promise of discoveries still more advanced. — Boston Herald.

CAME BACK.

The Cat Which Would Not be Lost.

A CAT THAT TOOK VOYAGES ALONE.

How She Left her Vessel, Took Voyages on Another, and Finally Returned to Her Own.

"And the cat came back;" not as the quotation would suggest, to the annoyance of the neighbors, but much to the joy and satisfaction of Captain Dow of the barkentine Planter. The feline in question is not of an aristocratic breed, but is built on the lines of a heavy-weight fighter. Nevertheless she has more good hard sense and intelligence than nine-tenths of the pugilists put together, Jim Corbett included. Like the champion, Jean knows when she has hold of a good thing, and on the strength of a couple of victories over an equal number of rats in the hold of the Planter, now holds undisputed sway over every vessel that sails between here and the Hawaiian Islands.

Captain Dow of the Planter, Captain John Feren of the Sailors' Home and the skipper of the brig W. G. Irwin are sponsors for the following story in regard to Jean and her remarkable movements.

Six years ago Jean was added to the menagerie at the Sailors' Home. In that interesting place can be found old wornout dogs, cats, foxes, monkeys and other animals that have been brought to San Francisco from foreign ports and of which the skippers have got tired. In the same congregation are parrots, magpies, linnets, canaries and thurshes.

Into this motley collection Jean was introduced during the latter part of 1889 by Captain John Feren. The kitten at once made friends with an old dog named "Boatswain," who had served his time on the American ship Undaunted. For five years these two ate out of the same dish, made a general walk around the establishment, took a mid-day siesta and at night would make their bed in the northwest corner of the clerk's office.

This state of affairs could not go on forever, and one fine morning Jean was dumped into a sack, and, along with a number of sailors, was shipped as part of the crew of the barkentine Planter. Captain Dow treated her well, and Jean soon got used to her new quarters. She made five trips to Hawaii and back. Never once, however, did she fail to pay a visit to Boatswain on her return to San Francisco. On those occasions she would be feasted by the employees of the Home, and finally her return came to be looked for as a matter of course.

When the sugar season was over Captain Dow was instructed to bring a couple of cargoes of guano from the Lycean Islands for use on the plantations. He accordingly made his arrangements to start from Honolulu, but when the hour for departure came the cat could not be found.

Dow's men searched for an hour along the front, but finally gave Jean up as lost and departed for the guano islands. On his return the skipper made further inquiries, but no one had seen the cat. Another round trip was made, and on this occasion the Planter docked alongside the brig W. G. Irwin. While the sailors on the barkentine were unbending sails they saw a cat on the poop of the brig.

The latter was earnestly looking at the Planter and seemed to take in every peculiarity from the truck to the main deck. The sailors hailed the deck and called out to the steward that Jean was on the Irwin. When the cat heard the cry she at once disappeared into the cabin of the Irwin.

A few minutes later she appeared on deck with a kitten in her mouth. She jumped on board the Planter and at once made her way to Captain Dow's room, where she deposited her offspring in her own favorite corner.

Five trips did she make to the Irwin and on each occasion she brought back a kitten to the Planter. Then when she had her family in safety among her old friends she hunted up Captain Dow, who was sitting in the chart-room, jumped up in his lap, licked his hands, then his face and finally went to sleep in his lap as though nothing had happened. Twenty minutes later she was looking for the steward in order to get something to eat.

When the Planter returned to San Francisco the first person Captain Dwo met was Captain Feren. "You've lost your cat, Captain," were the first words from the latter. "Indeed, I have not," was the answer. "She is here on board and has five kittens."

Feren looked surprised and said: "Well, when you were loading guano in the South Seas that cat was up at the home with old Boatswain. They wandered around the place together, but when I tried to lock Jean up in the office she jumped through a window and escaped."

A few days later the Captain of the Irwin solved the mystery. Jean had evidently lost her passage on the Planter, and the Irwin being the only ship in Honolulu bound for San Francisco she stowed herself away and on arrival in San Francisco visited her old friends. On her return to Honolulu she recognized the Planter and removed her family to Captain Dow's fostering care.

The official decision of Germany to call an international monetary conference for the purpose of rehabilitating silver as money, has again made the silver issue a prime topic of discussion. Dispatches quote a leading German newspaper as saying that the question in that country is of immense social importance, and it strongly suggests that the Emperor should assume command and lead the friends of silver on to victory. A leading financial journal has also urged the German Emperor to do this. In England the distress in India, through the depreciation in silver, which reflects upon the British cotton manufacturing districts has made the silver question a very serious one for the politicians, and telegrams just received say that the clamor for India is likely to become so great that the English delegates might consider the proposition which will come before the conference to reopen the mints in that country for free coinage in case any international agreement is effected. One leading financial journal in England, the Statist, boldly declares that if the United States reopened her mints to silver India would certainly follow her example.

The resolution in favor of an international conference to rehabilitate silver was moved in the British House of commons by a Liberal, seconded by a Conseavative and carried without a division. This shows how the importance of the subject has gained in British estimation. It was the situation in India which largely influenced the sentiment in the House. Germany has taken the lead in the movement. France and the Latin Union will be only to glad to return to their traditional monetary policy. On the whole the prospect for favorable action has never seemed so good before. It will be noted that in the Commons the most prominent expression was in favor of opening the Indian mints to silver and doing everything to increase the use of silver in Great Britain short of abandoning the gold standard. Perhaps that is all that could be expected of England at present. It is all that is necessary if the other parties to the conference will come together. They can settle the silver question among themselves. When it is settled and silver regains its normal status England may find it desirable in behalf of her own commercial and manufacturing classes to come into the arrangement.

The Paris Figaro states that the largest baccarat bank made at Monte Carlo in recent years was that of the Prince Collona, the son-in-law of John W. Mackay, and Prince Hatzfeldt, son-in-law of C. P. Huntington. The amount is said to have been $150,000—all of which was lost in less than half an hour's play. Princelings are expensive luxuries, and if Hatzfeldt has been playing in that sort of luck for any length of time, it is not surprising that Mr. Huntington wants a Reilly refunding bill and a harbor all his own. The law of "unnatural gravitation" by which Collis amassed his money is evidently being superseded in the case of the son-in-law by that discovered by Sir Isaac Newton.

Rev. Dr. Dille and Police Commissioner Tobin of San Francisco are having a lively time of it. The reverend gentleman repeated the charge that has been made so many times during the past dozen years, that Tobin was the owner of houses that are used for immoral purposes and which Tobin has never till the present time publicly resented. Now he threatens to sue Dille for libel, and Dille says he wants Tobin to go ahead and sue, as he can substantiate his charges. From this distance it looks as though Dille had the best of it. Certainly it is foolish to talk about a libel suit in such a case. The best way would appear to be to sell the houses.

The New York Legislature is considering a bill to provide whipping as a punishment for wife-beaters and all persons who "commit a felony accompanied by the infliction of pain or suffering on the person of another." The bill is strongly supported and is very likely to become a law.

CREAM IN COLD WEATHER.

How to Manage It Before Taking It to the Creamery.

With the deep setting or Cooley system it is necessary to have the temperature of the room in which the cans are set not so cool as to chill the cream or freeze it, in which case the butter would be bitter and not of a desirable flavor. The same care would need to be exercised about having any foreign or objectionable oders in the room that could be absorbed by the cool milk or cream.

In the Cooley creamers the milk can, cover and all, is submerged below the surface of the water, and the milk should be set as soon as it is drawn from the cows and before it has any opportunity to get cool. The temperature of the water may be at any point near 40 degrees. Varying a little above or below would be no disadvantage, but it should not be higher than 42 or 43 degrees, and it is better to have it 40 degrees or below. If the cows from which the milk is drawn are fed on ensilage largely and the milk be set before it has an opportunity to cool, this process will obtain all the cream.

If the cows are fed on dry feed and grain and have been in milk some time, then it is an advantage to dilute the milk before it is set with hot water at a temperature of from 120 to 130 degrees, which should raise the temperature of the milk to about 105 degrees. Then stir the milk and water thoroughly together and submerge the cans in water as quickly as possible. This process, if carefully followed, will separate the cream thoroughly from the milk. I am aware that some of the experiment stations have stated that there is no advantage in diluting the milk for the thoroughness of the separation, but a careful examination of these reports will show that they have used methods of their own in the dilution, and not such as are recommended by the manufacturers of the Cooley creamers and have been successfully used by dairymen who have followed the instructions of the inventor.

In the open setting the cream is ripened while being raised, and therefore is ready for churning when taken from the pans, but in the Cooley or submerged process the cream has been kept in a perfect state and has not changed at all. Therefore it must be ripened after it is taken from the cans in the creamer. One of the best ways for doing this is to have a cream pail with a close cover and with an agitator, a thimble through the cover for the handle of the agitator and a cover on the thimble. When each mess of cream is poured into this pail, the agitator should be moved up and down once or twice, so as thoroughly to mix the mess of cream last put in with the cream already there. This should be done at each skimming and when new cream is poured in, so that the cream will ripen evenly. It should be kept in a room that is somewhere from 60 to 70 or 75 degrees.

The day before churning, unless the dairy is large enough to churn every day, no cream should be put into this pail, but another pail should be used so as to give all the cream an opportunity to ripen thoroughly. If the cream of the last day or the last mess be put in before churning and not given an opportunity to ripen, it will not churn so easily as the older cream, the old cream coming to butter before the new, and the new largely running off with the buttermilk, so that a very large proportion of the cream of the last skimming might be lost. The advantage of not putting any cream into the mess that is to be churned later than 24 hours preceding the churning will be readily seen.

Another advantage of not putting in this cold cream is that the cream will be churned more readily than if the cold cream is put in. I have known cream to be delayed in churning several hours by putting cold, unripened cream into the other mess, while without it the mess would have been churned in what is considered the best time, somewhere from 30 to 40 minutes. It is pretty generally conceded that it is better to be about that time rather than to have a "lightning" churn, and churn in a few minutes. To make the richest flavored butter the cream should be just on the point of turning, or what is more often called ripened, and before it takes on the acid flavor.—E. P. E. in Rural New Yorker.

Dairy and Creamery.

Up in New Brunswick is a place called New Denmark. Twenty-two years ago nothing was there but forest and a station built by the British government. Today 90 farmers are making a good living there, with the help of the dairy business. Early in 1894, 33 of them started a co-operative cheese factory, and the first year's work produced 21,000 pounds. The Canadian government is moving the earth to push Dominion dairy products. Even in the pioneer region of New Denmark professors from the government agricultural stations follow up the settler and instruct him in the mysteries of silo building and butter and cheese making. If the United States government or our state governments manifested half as much interest in our advancement in the dairy industry, the United States would soon be at the head of dairy countries. But she is going to be so anyhow. Liberal minded and wide awake private dairymen are going to make her so.

If you get cream by the open milk setting process, be sure that the temperature of the room in which the milk is set is maintained evenly at from 60 to 65 degrees. Wide changes of temperature interfere greatly with cream rising.

Two pounds and one-half ounce of rich cream or 15 pounds and 12 ounces of good milk will make a pound of butter.

The joists and flooring of a cheese-room should be very strong to support the weight of three shelves, one above another, piled with 60 pound cheeses.

Have your cheese curing room divided into two or three compartments in which to put cheese of different ages.

REPORT OF THE GRAND JURY.

INDEPENDENCE, Inyo Co, Cal. March 6, 1895.

To the Hon N. D. ARNOT,

Acting Judge of the Superior Court of Inyo County Cal.

The Grand Jury impanelled by you on the 11th of December 1894, submitted to you on the 14 h of December, 1894 its report of that session.

In the aforesaid report a resolution was embodied to employ an expert to examine the County Books and Records for the years 1893 and 1894.

Your Honor allowed the Grand Jury to adjourn until the 5th day of March 1895.

Pursuant to adjournment we, the Grand Jury have convened on the 5th day of March 1895, seventeen of our body being present, respectfully submit to your Honor the following final report of our proceedings:—

Expert W. M. Wills having examined the books and accounts of the several County Officers for the two years commencing Jan. 1st 1893, and ending Dec. 31st, 1894, finds only a few insignificant discrepancies which are enumerated in his report.

The Expert exonerates our County Officials in the following language:—"I find the business of the County Assessor to have been conducted in a painstaking and business-like manner."

Sheriff and Tax Collector.—"I find that all acts of the above named officer to have been correct and show carefulness and integrity."

Clerk, Auditor, and Recorder:—"The business of this office has been conducted in a most excellent manner, as shown by the neatness and correctness with which all acts of the office have been performed. I find that all fees and moneys collected by this office have been regularly turned over to the Treasurer as shown by his receipts.

Superintendent of Schools:—"I find the accounts of this officer to be correct."

Coroner and Public Administrator:—"I find that all moneys collected by the Coroner have been turned in to the Treasurer and receipts issued for the same."

Treasurer:—"The business of this office I find to have been performed in an able manner and find no errors existing."

Recommendation:—Expert Wills as well as Expert W. J. Harris recommend that the County Officials compare notes at regular stated periods.

Several cases were duly examined, all of which were in order.

Some complaints having been made by responsible parties intimating that certain Justices of the Peace have been negligent—not having accounted or tendered certain fines imposed and collected to the proper authorities—we deem it necessary to warn those functionaries to attend scrupulously to legal requirements.

Respectfully submitted,

A. O. COLLINS
Foreman.

Gone Moab to Die.

John Wilson and F. Miranda of Lone Pine, Inyo County, Cal., who have been in San Francisco for some time under medical treatment, arrived in Reno last evening, remained over at the Palace and this morning started south for their home. Both gentlemen are in a very feeble condition, and gained no relief from their visit to California. The former is suffering from Bright's disease of the kidneys, and was hardly able to walk, while the latter has heart troubles, but was some stronger than the other. It was a pitiable sight they presented at the depot this morning, when Mr. Miranda was using the little strength spared him in assisting his companion on to the train. Parties standing on the platform, noticing their enfeebled condition, stepped in and saw that they were comfortably seated in the cars. Finding that they could get no relief from the best physicians in San Francisco, the men said they had concluded to go home to die.—Reno Gazette

"Death's Bridal.

By DAVID KER.

But in proposing to carry her lover as far as the town with Zeke's help the heroic girl had overrated her own strength, which the superhuman exertions of the past day and night had already strained beyond endurance. For a time she bore up nobly, spurred on by the thought that her lover's life depended on his being brought within the reach of surgical aid as soon as possible; but with every moment the onward struggle grew harder, and the weight of the helpless man more intolerable, till at last her overtasked strength fairly gave way, and she sank utterly exhausted beside her unconscious lover, while Zeke, at his wits' end what to do, stood staring blankly at them both.

But just then two negroes came jogging along a byroad in a light cart, right up to the spot, and Zeke, by the offer of a large reward if they brought the wounded man in alive, easily induced them to "tote de Linkun ossifer" (for such he represented Arthur to be) into the town. Constance seated herself in the cart, and, taking her lover's powerless head in her lap, did her best to save him from the shock of the constant jolting, while Zeke walked beside them.

All through that weary journey—every moment of which seemed to the anxious girl as long as an hour—Arthur Fortescue lay in a kind of stupor, apparently quite unconscious of the deafening uproar that was now rending the very sky. "Fighting Joe Hooker" was attacking the left of the southern position while Thomas assailed the right, and the earth shaking thunder of the cannon was now mingled with the ceaseless crackle of countless rifles, while the deep chested shouts of the Federals and the shrill yells of the Confederates, echoed and re-echoed from every cleft and cranny of the mountain, swelled the maddening din!

But long as their weary drive had seemed, when every moment might make all the difference between life and death, yet when they finally reached the hospital the thought that in a few minutes she might hear the surgeons pronounce her lover's death sentence fell so crushingly on Constance's heavy heart that she almost wished the delay even longer.

The battle having but recently begun, the doctors were not yet fully occupied, and one of the oldest of them came forward to examine the wounded man, looking very grave as he heard that the wound had been inflicted by a bursting shell. Dimly, as if in a dream, she saw him approach, watched him draw back the sufferer's clothing and glance at the wound—heard the one word "Mortal"—and fell to the ground in merciful unconsciousness.

When she came to herself again she saw that her lover had regained his senses, and was gazing at her with a deep, tender pity in his sunken eyes.

"Am I going to die, darling?" he asked feebly.

Constance tried in vain to speak, but the dumb despair of her white, rigid face was answer enough.

"Let me call you mine just once, then, at the last!" he pleaded, with a momentary glow on his haggard face. "Send for a clergyman and let us be married before I die."

Every detail of the scene that ensued was stamped forever on the memory of all who beheld it. The pale, delicate, handsome features of the young noble, who had escaped death so often when life was worthless to him, only to fall just when the happiness of which he had despaired was fairly within his reach at last; the sad, sweet face of his beautiful bride, where the bitter grief of a loving and bereaved woman was chastened and glorified by the sacred enthusiasm of a martyr; the good old clergyman with his snow white hair and kind, pitying face; the silent ring of spectators; the wounded men behind, leaning out of their cots to watch this bridal of death, and, high over all, the surging billows of battle smoke rolling like storm clouds across the sky.

There was a lull in the uproar just then, as if even the din of battle were hushing itself in the presence of that supreme tragedy. Thomas' first attack upon Missionary Ridge had been repulsed with heavy loss, and his men were now forming again for a fresh charge.

As the gloomy ceremony came to an end a burly form darkened the doorway. It was Dr. Scalpell, one of Constance's best friends and warmest admirers, who had just learned what was going on—a bluff, hearty, outspoken man, caring not a straw what he said or to whom he said it, but as skillful and gentle in action as he was rough in speech and manner.

"Is that you, Scalpell?" asked the wounded man faintly.

"Hello! are you able to speak?" cried the doctor, advancing. "Why, they told me you were mortally wounded!"

"Dr. Morton himself said so," rejoined Constance in a hardly audible voice.

"Dr. Mortal, as we call him—the veriest old croaker alive!" growled Scalpell. "Just looks at a man and says he's bound to die! Great Cæsar! does any one think that if the splinter of a shell had really torn right through this man's chest close to the heart, two good hours ago, he would be alive and able to speak now? I'll lay my life that hurt wasn't made by the shell at all, but only by a piece of the broken miniature case. Just let me have a look at it, will you?"

Kneeling down beside the sufferer, he made a close inspection of the wound, and then, to the unspeakable relief of all present, broke into a hearty laugh.

"Miss Constance," said he, chuckling, "you've been married under false pretenses, and can fairly apply for a divorce if you wish it. This man's no more mortally wounded than I am. Your portrait has saved him, as I hear it did once before. He's got a couple of ribs broken, it's true; but that's a trifle to a splendid constitution like his. If he's well nursed, as he is pretty safe to be in your hands, there's no earthly reason why he shouldn't live to trouble you for many a year yet, though I'm afraid we shall get no more fighting out of him just at present."

Dr. Scalpell proved a true prophet; for though the young viscount did no more fighting under the Stars and Stripes, he was able, ere many months had passed, to cross the sea and take possession of his Irish estates, where he and his beautiful bride inaugurated a new era, and strove zealously to undo the evil wrought by the gloomy old man who had preceded him. Evictions, rackrents and "moonlighting" are alike unknown on the flourishing Doneraile estates, and an old lodgekeeper and ex-soldier, named Mike O'Reilly, always declares that the "young masther" (as he still calls the gray haired viscount) "is a dale too good for a lord."

THE END.

FAMOUS ARCHERS.

Stories of Wonderful Skill With Bow and Arrow.

The expression "drawing a long bow" does not of necessity mean the telling of a falsehood. It sometimes refers to a wonderful story, which may be true enough, but which is so marvelous as to require a firm trust in the veracity of the narrator to enable the hearer to believe it. Some of the longest bows of this sort have been drawn about bows and arrows.

These stories began long ago. Virgil, in the "Æneid," tells of four archers who were shooting for a prize, the mark being a pigeon tied by a cord to the mast of a ship. The first man hit the mast, the second cut the cord, and the third shot the pigeon as it flew away. The fourth archer, having nothing left to shoot, drew his bow and sent his arrow flying toward the sky with such speed that the friction of the air set the feathers on fire, and it swept on, like a meteor, to disappear in the clouds.

The stories told of Robin Hood's archery, illustrated by his wonderful performance as Locksley in Scott's "Ivanhoe," are also a decided strain upon a sensible person's credulity. The famous story of William Tell, doubted by many persons, is believed by others to have a foundation of fact. There was a Dane named Foke of whom the same story is told, and William of Cloudesley, an Englishman, is said to have shot an apple from his son's head merely to show his expertness.

Most stories of bows and arrows relate to the accurate aim of the archers, but a Frenchman, Blaise de Vigenere, tells one that shows the tremendous force with which an arrow may be propelled if the bow be strong and long enough. According to his own account of the matter, he saw Barbarossa, a Turk, admiral of a ship called the Grand Solyman, send an arrow from his bow right through a cannon ball.—Philadelphia Times.

He Was Smart Enough.

"I witnessed a very interesting incident when I was in Washington a couple of years ago," said Francis T. Gray of St. Louis, "and I have frequently laughed over the lesson it taught. I was strolling out one of the broad avenues in the residence part of the town, Connecticut, I think it was. Well, a couple of Chinamen, attired in robes of silk and satin of the most gorgeous description, came pushing along at the characteristic gait of their race. The superior appearance of the Celestials did not appear to affect a number of small boys who were loitering on a corner, for there was an immediate chorus of 'Chinamen eat rats' as the men approached. The Chinamen took no notice of the juveniles, who followed in their rear, continuing their shouting. Farther up the street a youth was standing on the sidewalk, and as the Chinamen passed him he, evidently inspired by the boys, asked them what shirts were being washed at. He apparently thought the Chinamen didn't know a word of English. You can imagine his discomfiture then when one of them turned to him with an expression of the deepest commiseration on his face and remarked in excellent United States:

"'You seem to be a very nice looking fellow. What makes you such a fool?'"—Washington Star.

Brasses and Bronzes of the Hindoos.

The brass and bronze trade is kept alive by the religious customs of the Hindoos, who are not allowed to use wooden and earthenware vessels freely, and brass and bronze are to them as important as glass and china to the westerners. Almost all Hindoo utensils are of brass, copper or bronze, and it is the custom to present the female portion of a Hindoo family with a valuable batterie de cuisine, made either of brass or copper, and a still existing Hindoo ceremony is that of carrying the utensils in a procession at the wedding. The result of this custom is that almost all the platters, trays, bowls, nut crackers and all brass and copper utensils are most beautifully ornamented, and there are lovely combinations of brass and copper and silver and copper. All Hindoo women used to have lovely brass caskets covered with ornamentations called chellams, manufactured in Malabar, in which they kept their jewels, but these are fast being replaced by the vulgar English japanned dispatch box. At Sivaganga a beautiful but seldom patronized brass trade exists, which makes toys and most lifelike representations of animals, lizards, frogs, etc.—Chicago Tribune.

Aluminium and Glass.

M. Charles Margot of the physical laboratory of the University of Geneva, says L'Industrie, has made a curious discovery. He has found that by rubbing on glass with an aluminium point we obtain clear metallic lines, which cannot be removed by washing, no matter how often repeated. Many applications can be suggested for aluminium in this direction. It can be used instead of the engraver's tool in cutting designs on glass. With the aluminium pencil diamonds can be distinguished from imitation, since it will make no mark on a diamond. It is possible that the new discovery may make a great difference in the making of cut or engraved glass.

WOMAN'S BUSY YEAR.

Her Forced Recognition in Politics and Literature.

MOVEMENT TO REFORM THE WORLD.

How Women are Gradually Working Themselves into Prominent Positions—Demand for Equality with Men.

The year 1894 has been a busy one for women. Some of them have been actively engaged in praiseworthy pursuits and the rest have been displaying equal activity in calling the attention of the public to themselves. The new woman has attained a prominence during the past year for which she had previously longed in vain. She has done much to bring herself into prominence, and what she has failed to do her apologists, analysts, and commentators generally have done for her. She has had a play named for her and poems dedicated to her. Sermons have been addressed to her. There was one in Sunday's "World" from no less a light than his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons. Psychological studies, yclepted novels, have been written about her. Clothes have been designed for her, and clubs have made special provision for her entertainment. The effect of the mere general new woman upon the drama, literature, and social life of 1894 has been great. The effect of the particular organizations and individuals has been almost incalculable.

The part which women have taken in politics during the past year has been most significant. In the States where equal suffrage prevails they have been important factors in the election. In Colorado they not only voted at the last election, but they voted to such good effect that there will be women in the next State Senate. In Kansas, where municipal suffrage prevails, and where the name of Mrs. Mary Ellen Lease is one to conjure with, the instructive sight of women managing an entire town is to be seen. The returns from the city of Spring Hill on April 3 stated that women had control of all the municipal offices, including the mayoralty.

In the East, especially in New York, woman's political activity has been marked. The spring of 1894 saw a more popular demand for the suffrage than even the most ardent suffragists had expected to see. It became fashionable to demand the ballot. Parlor meetings for the instruction of the ignorant and the conversion of the opposing took the place of afternoon teas. Women prominent in society, in philanthropic work, and in professional life all took an active interest in the amendment which the suffragists petitioned to have inserted into the State constitution granting women equal political rights with men. The constitutional convention refused to allow the amendment to be inserted and acted upon by the people, and therefore the suffrage agitation of the spring was to a certain degree a failure. But, in that it aroused an interest in woman's rights where that interest had been most conspicuously lacking before, and removed from the plea for equal rights the stigma of unwomanliness, it was far from a failure.

When the women of New York failed to obtain the right of suffrage they promptly went to work to show how well they could have used that right and how well they could get along without it. The government of New York city was notoriously corrupt.

All the better influences were needed to overcome corruption and make good government possible. The women of the city in large numbers banded themselves together to do what they could in the cause of political wholesomeness. The Woman's Municipal League, exercising a great educational influence, worked valiantly for reform. The name of Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell is indissolubly associated with the overthrow of the Tammany tiger, and there were other equally active workers in less prominent positions.

Educationally women have prospered as they have in all other lines. Harvard University has pledged itself to look out for the welfare of Radcliffe College, once Harvard Annex. A woman, Miss Agnes Irvin, has been chosen Radcliffe's dean, the first one in its history. Columbia's Annex, Barnard, has also a woman at its head in the very efficient person of Miss Emily James Smith. Tufts College, in Massachusetts, has opened its doors to women. Even the stronghold of conservatism, Scotland, has felt the influence of the times, and within the last few months the University of Edinburgh has admitted women to its medical school.

Women have gained positions on schoolboards, noticeably in the case of Boston, where the achievements of Mrs. Emily Fifield on that body are pointed to with pride. Mrs. Fifield has managed to make the board pass an order which fills the hearts of juvenile Boston with despair. It is to the effect that the apple woman and taffy seller must end their careers as purveyors of school luncheons, and permit the absolutely hygienic New England kitchen to minister to the noonday wants of young Bostonians. Such an eminently practical measure as this shows what women would do if it were their province to serve in public positions more largely.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, both here and abroad, has kept the eyes of the world fixed upon it with anticipation. It has re-elected Miss Frances Willard its president. It has planned a remarkable crusade against drunkenness, in which a hundred crusaders were to go from land to land and from potentate to potentate praying for the abolition of all drinks not approved by the W. C. T. U. It is not to be counted among woman's achievements that this crusade was undertaken, but it is to be set down to her credit that sober second thought probably convinced the W. C. T. U. of the futility of this scheme. This organization has also furnished the public much innocent amusement from time to time by adopting resolutions declaring against various apparently harmless things, such as wooden soldiers, drums, or other toys likely to arouse a martial spirit.

Sorosis, the mother of women's clubs has this year started a new organization. This is the New York Federation of Women's Societies and Clubs, a State confederation which promises to be a very efficient organization for binding together small societies, giving them large interests, while at the same time maintaining their individuality intact.

Various women of different degrees of prominence have undertaken to reform the world along some particular line. Mrs. Laura Ormiston Chant objected to the evil features of the London music halls, and objected to such purpose that she succeeded in reforming them to a certain degree. Lady Henry Somerset objected violently to living pictures, and has crusaded vigorously against them. Mrs. Elizabeth Grannis, of New York, turned her attention to the semi-private individuals known as society people, and delivered herself of views on the low-necked bodice which were forcible and perhaps more or less effective.

The bicycle having become a popular mode of conveyance among women, clothes of the hybrid order are growing in favor. Since the beginning of the year 1894 bloomers, divided skirts—yea, even knickerbockers—have become so ordinary that the woman who wears them no longer attracts particular attention. At Berkeley College, in California, the young women have even gone so far as to adopt a rainy-day uniform of abbreviated and semi-masculine garments, which they wear with great self-possession.

A woman—Miss Mercer, of Pittsburg—has received the prize for a design for a building for the Atlanta exhibition. Miss Hand and Miss Gannon, of New York, School of Design, have designed a building for San Francisco which has been accepted, although among their competitors were several men. In law Miss Melle Stanleyetta Titus, of New York, has won laurels. She is the first woman who applied to practice at the bar of New York in twenty years, and the first one to be accepted.

Feminine royalty has not been entirely uninteresting this year. The Princess Alix, now Czarina of Russia, afforded to the world the pleasant example of a young person who would not subordinate her conscience entirely to the demands of a royal marriage. The Princess Louise, Queen Victoria's daughter, has made her first appearance as an illustrator. She has illustrated "Auld Robin, the Farmer," which has just appeared.

Over in Onehunga, New Zealand, Mrs. Yates, has shown a skeptical world what woman can do as mayor. Unfortunately Mrs. Yates has shown it in such a way as to discourage the idea of feminine office-holding. She does not admit the rights of man either as man or as an alderman, and her Council meetings are said to be scenes of incomparable tyranny.

There are various lesser lights who have done something to win distinction for themselves or to give the world pleasure. Mrs. Lease, of Kansas, has succumbed to nervous prostration. Lilian Russell has acquired and parted from a third husband. She has also lost several pounds in weight. Miss Helen Dortch, of Georgia, has borne up under the blow of having the Georgia Legislature decide that a woman was ineligible to hold the office of private secretary to the Governor.

There have been some notable deaths in the feminine ranks. Constance Fenimore Woolson, Celia Thaxter, Emma Fursch-Madi, the singer; Mrs. Mary Hemenway, the millionaire philanthropist, of Boston; Laura Schirmer Mapleson, the singer; Helen Schaefer, president of Wellesley; Elizabeth Peabody, Rosina Vokes, the actress, and Isabella Thackeray, the widow of the novelist.—N. Y. Mail.

HIGH PRICES FOR FLOWERS.

Christmas gifts supplied by ristflos this year consisted almost entirely of boxes of cut flowers, violets and roses being the favorites. Large deep-colored Marie Louise violets their long stems allowing of loose graceful arrangement sold for as much as $5 a hundred. Roses cost from $3 to $18 a dozen an extra quality of American Beauty commanding the outside price of $3 each.

Lilacs at 25 cents to 50 cents a spray tulips at $1 a dozen, large showy heads of Poinsettia at 25 cents each and stevia at 50 cents for a small bunch were specialties of the holiday season. Carnations were plentiful and cheap; some well-cultivated specimens of William Scott measuring two and a-half inches across brought the extreme price of $2 a dozen. The orchid season is now fairly begun and cut blooms of Cattleya at $9 a dozen and Cypripedium insigne at $4 a dozen were in good supply.—N. Y. Garden and Forest.

CONGRESS CAN'T DO IT.

There is a general hope and belief throughout the country that Congress will do something finally for the distress and suffering of so many hapless people. It is to be hoped business will start up and give employment to thousands. But there are certain kinds of suffering which Congress can do nothing to relieve. There is pain and misery always which no legislation can cure. Just think of men crippled for life with the tortures of sciatica. And such should know that St. Jacobs Oil is a certain cure, which can be brought about promptly without any aid from Congress.

At Gravelotte there were 320,000 men opposed, and the killed and wounded numbered 48,000.

Mr. Gladstone has lived to be eighty-five years of age, with little abatement of his physical and less impairment of his mental energies; and principally because he has taken thirty-two chews to every swallow—a fact commended to the many statesmen who allow their incisory powers to become disproportionate to their powers of mastication.

EXPERIENCE.

Experience teaches not only weakness, but strength and the value of good remedies, such as Allcock's Porous Plasters. This is what C. D. Fredericks, the well known photographer of New York, says:

"I have been using Allcock's Porous Plasters for 20 years, and found them one of the best of family medicines. Briefly summing up my experience, I say that when placed on the small of the back Allcock's Plasters fill the body with nervous energy, and thus cure fatigue, brain exhaustion, debility and kidney difficulties. For women and children I have found them invaluable. They never irritate the skin or cause the slightest pain, but cure sore throat, coughs, colds, pains in side, back or chest, indigestion and bowel complaints.

HOPE CRUSHED TO EARTH

Will rise again in the bosom of a dyspeptic wise enough to substitute for the pseudo-tonics, which have bamboozled him out of his belief in the possibility of cure, the real invigorant and stomachic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The bilious, the nervous, the dyspeptic, the rheumatic, alike derive speedy benefit from this helpful botanic medicine. Persons suffering from indigestion will gain no positive permanent good from the fiery, unmedicated stimulants of commerce, too often used recklessly. The Bitters is immeasurably to be preferred to these as a tonic, since its pure basis is modified by the conjunction with it of vegetable ingredients of the highest remedial excellence. Malaria is prevented and remedied by it, and it imparts vigor into the weak and sickly. A wineglassful three times a day is the average dose.

In maidenhood, womanhood, wifehood and motherhood the "Prescription" is a supporting tonic and nervine that's peculiarly adapted to her needs, regulating, strengthening and curing the derangements of the sex. Why is it so many women owe their beauty to Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription? Because beauty of form and face radiate from the common center—health. The best bodily condition results from good food, fresh air and exercise coupled with the judicious use of the "Prescription."

If there be headache, pain in the back, bearing-down sensations, or general debility, or if there be nervous disturbance, nervous prostration, and sleeplessness, the "Prescription" reaches the origin of the trouble and corrects it. It dispels aches, and pains, corrects displacements and cures catarrhal inflammation of the lining membranes, falling of the womb, ulceration, irregularities and kindred maladies.

FUTURE OF THE JAPS.

They Leap Into the Front Rank of Nations.

REFLECTIONS ON THEIR FUTURE.

Interesting Speculations Regarding that Marvelous People—Their Progress is Amazingly Rapid.

The man must be dull or at least lacking in imagination, who reads daily the history of this war in the far East and does not speculate, however carelessly, on the form which the civilization of this Japanese people will ultimately take. There has been nothing so amazing or so interesting in modern history as their sudden bound forward into a new life without precedent in Asia. Secluded for 2,000 years from all external influences except a slight one exercised from China, and then brought against their will into violent contact with Europe, they have in a short twenty years assimilated so much of the knowledge and organization of the West as to place themselves on a level of power with most European states; have conquered, almost without effort, the huge neighbor who despised them; and will probably within a few months stand forward a compact, highly organized modern state, with a full treasury, a fleet able to deal with an equal one of the highest scientific construction, and an army which may be, for any evidence to the contrary, equal in fighting pewer to any other army of equal numbers. Released from the torpor of ages, full of the pride of life, and conscious to their finger-tips of capacity for effort, what will they next do in the way of self-development? By all the analogies to be drawn from history they should, even if they are not a staying people—upon which point we shall have a word to say presently—for the next hundred or hundred and fifty years advance swiftly; and in what direction will the advance be?

We set aside for the moment all questions of war, though the Japanese may be, and probably intend to be, a masterful power in Asia, and confine ourselves for the moment to their internal civilization. They believe themselves that this will be an industrial one, and they are probably right. With their splendid geographical position, between Asia and America, yet detached from both; with their aptitude for shipbuilding and sailoring; with their proved capacity for making and using all machinery; with their genius for design and their instinct for manufacture; with an adequate population and a receptiveness for discipline greater than that of most Europeans—there is no reason in the world why, longing for wealth, they should not make it in this way, or why a part of the carrying trade and a large part of the commerce of Asia, which has enriched Europe from the days of Solomon, should not pass into their hands. They think it will, and they will strive that it shall, and they will prove, at least, most formidable rivals. Industry never, however, quite absorbs a nation; and while the energetic classes are covering the land with factories, shipbuilding yards, and foundries—in which latter they will achieve great triumphs—they should also make a rushing advance in art and in science and in literature. In the first named they will probably achieve only a partial success, architecture being barred off by the earthquakey character of their habitat, and sculpture by their indifference to beauty of form; but in painting, especially landscape painting, they may achieve miracles.

They will learn speedily all Europe knows of methods; they are born naturalists, and they have an instinct for color which never fails them; with their feeling for mountain scenery, for the flora of their own land, and for birds, they should be the landscape painters of the world. They should be the chemists also. They have done little in other branches of science, but they display already a marvelous aptitude in some branches of applied chemistry, as witness their colors and their glazes; and it is to this that their habits of patient inquiry, exact observation, and eagerness in experiment are sure to lead them in the end. They may make marvelous discoveries, some of them in medicine and some in war—Colonel Maurice suspects that they are already using "high explosives" against fortifications in a new way—and outstrip, if not the greater chemists of Europe, yet the best of those who apply their science to industrial progress. The Japanese, we predict with some confidence, will within a few years be lecturing in Europe to crowds of eager inquirers into the most profitable methods of applying science. Remember, they have proved that they can acquire all Europe has to teach, and seek more knowledge of their own. In art and science they will become as capable as the French, and probably manifest much the same merits and defects, though the latter will be diminished by their habit of taking infinite trouble. And as to literature? It is there that the outside observer is most baffled. Literature springs from the mind and the soul, and no European pretends that, as regards the Japanese, he perfectly understands either the soul or the mind. The upper classes are now practically without a creed, as completely indifferent to the great question of the whence and whither as ever Roman nobles were: and there is no evidence to show whether they will remain in that mood, or will develop a new creed of their own, or with a new application of their strange power of assimilating ideas will accept Christianity as the creed of the progressive peoples and run it into some new and unthought-of mold. Judging from the analogy of their past, the latter is the course they will take, but although this course has appealed to many Japanese as the wisest there is no sign of their adopting it yet, and there are great obstacles in the way, the most serious perhaps being not the superstition of the people, who hold their beliefs very lightly, but the danger of wrecking the great instrument of Japanese progress, their willingness to follow any guidance given under the sacro-sanct authority of the Mikado, which could hardly survive official recognition that Christianity was substantially true.

It is upon the choice they make in the religious direction that the literary development of the Japanese depends; and as to this, there is no ground even for guessing. If they remain as they are, indifferent to the spiritual, then we should expect from them a complete and methodical application of a utilitarian philosophy different from any seen in Europe, because starting not from unconscious Christianity, but from unconscious Paganism. Mill and the rest were full of a pity for the mass of mankind really derived from Christianity, and in furtherance of it preached equality, tolerance, and the duty of diffusing wisdom; but a utillitarian philosopher who was also a Pagan might preach—we think would preach—very different ideas; might establish a system of caste-culture and caste-government, the dominant caste being "the truly cultured"—a system of which the beginnings are already visible in Japan, where a lady can inquire, in absolute sincerity, "What is the use of religion to common folk;" might think intolerance wiser than tolerance—we do so about many moral ideas—and might place duty to country, or to the work in hand, or to the community, entirely above duty to an invisible power, or to one's own instinctive conscience. The honest defenders of vivisection in Europe do that now. The thouhgtful class in an ambitious and active state of pure agnostics, avoiding speculation as to the supernatural, would be almost sure to take that line; and on that line, though a civilization can be built, a litreature cannot. The Athenian aristocrats who for a few years developed such astonishing intellectual power, were in no sense agnostics; they invented supreme supernatural powers like Zeus, Nemesis, Ananke, rather than remain without sanctions higher than the will of man.

The Japanese, too, will be hampered in any great developement of their literature by the language difficulty; for they will wish to be understood in Europe and in Asia, and neither Europe nor Asia will acquire their tongue. They must, therefore, either make their great literature local, which is inconsistent with their passionate desire for universal recognition and respect, or they must adopt a tongue as the tongue of literature which Europe will consent too learn, and that will fetter their native genius, whatever line it takes, to a painful degree. No doubt the Russians have met and have in great part surmounted the same obstacles; but then the Russians are essentially Europeans, and speak a tongue which is not transmuted when it undergoes translation into French. These thoughts are, of course, mere speculations, for no one can predict the mental movement which in Japan must soon follow the political one; but if no creed attracts the Japanese they must be, as far as we can calculate, a great Pagan people, holding a utilitarian faith, not softened or mellowed by the benevolence and the sympathy which Christianity begets. They are kindly by nature among each other, but toward subjects who resist, or outsiders who interfere, they are capable of more than Prussian rigor.

We have intimated a doubt as to the duration of the Japanese advance, and it is founded upon another doubt. Is their assimilative power, now so wonderfully displayed in so many directions, the power of the whole nation, or only of its upper class? We can give no dogmatic answer, but as far as we understand the facts, the body of the people remain substantially what they have always been, clever, bright, and docile, with a quite singular capacity for carrying out orders exactly, but no sign in them of original power. They will do anything the cultivated tell them, but they do not greatly change. If that is accurate, and the new civilization of Japan, with its marvelous power of assimilation, is confined, say, to 100,000 families, then its vitality may die as the vitality of the Greek civilization did. A class rarely manifests abnormal force for more than 100 years any more than a family does, and the force which the gverning class of Japan is now displaying is surely abnormal. There has been nothing like it in Asia since the Arabs achieved their temporary triumphs in war and in architecture and in chemical research. It may not be so, and the whole Japanese people may be potentially equal to their present rulers, in which case they have a grand reservoir to draw up; but it is upon this as yet unresolved question that the duration of Japanese progress mainly depends.—London Spectator.

First Street Fakir—Its' a shame, Bill, to think that any one would swindle a poor hard-working man that way. Second Street Fakir—Why, what's the trouble? Fifty Years Progress in America She Shows to Have Been Fifty Years of Progress for Women.

Looking back over my life, which has been a long and very busy one, the first thing that I notice is the wonderful progress made by my own sex in every detail of life. The young men and women, young husbands and wives of to-day cannot realize how things were in the early part of this century. To say that a revolution has occurred between 1800 and 1895 is to say little or nothing.

In those early days it was gentlemanly to use wine to excess; it was customary and was the law for a husband to take all of his wife's property and use it as he pleased. There were cases, not one or two nor twenty or thirty, but hundreds, in which designing men would marry innocent girls for their money, and almost as soon as the marriage vow was uttered would waste their wives' dowries in riotous living. If a man failed his creditors attached his wife's property and frequently took away from her everything she had, even down to little ornaments for her children or family keepsakes that had been transmitted to her by her parents and grandparents. There were cases where women with lazy or dissipated husbands would try to work to support themselves and their little ones, and when it came around to the weekly or monthly pay-day a creditor of the husband or the wretched man himself would appear upon the scene, collect the proceeds of her toil and let her go penniless to, it might be, a starving household. And, stranger still, the father had the right of custody over the children at the expense of the mother. These facts will illustrate a condition in which women had no rights and no privileges; where, in fact, they hardly had a soul to call their own.

The thing struck me so forcibly that in my youth I determined to enter public life and battle for my sex. I thought the matter over very carefully and conscientiously and resolved never to marry, but to devote all my time and ability to the cause of humanity.

My father was a Quaker in an age when to be a Quaker involved a strong will power and great firmness of character. I received a good education, but, unlike most young women of those days, I was trained as a matter of conscience on the part of my parents to honest self-support. I chose the calling of a school teacher and followed this calling with considerable success for fifteen years. My experiences were varied, but, taken altogether, extremely pleasant. One that promised to be very disagreeable wound up in exactly the opposite manner. It was at a school at Center Falls in 1839. There was a certain very bad boy there, aged about 15, who had made my predecessors' life a very unhappy one. He was a young man whose only qualifications for the office of teacher were intellectual ones.

He lacked firmness and had lost the respect of his scholars, who, under the leadership of the bad boy mentioned, had made his career a continuous torment, and who finally had chased him out of a window. The boys had heard of me as a meek young Quaker girl who did not believe in flogging, and had agreed upon any number of surprises for my particular benefit. The day came and I entered the school. My appearance must have confirmed the reports that the boys had heard, for they immediately began indulging in various pranks and antics in which the bad boy took the initiative. I called him to the platform in my quietest manner, told him to lay off his coat, and then, with a good birch rod which I had provided for the occasion, I administered with great precision and some muscularity a lesson to this young gentleman which completely revolutionized not only his pre-existing notions but also those of the entire class. From that time on until the end of the term he and they were among the best scholars that I ever had. This is one of the few occasions when necessity compelled me to depart from my principles.

In 1840 three questions began to agitate the American public, all of which were to become powerful factors in the development of the American nation. They were temperance, anti-slavery and woman's suffrage. I made myself acquainted with many of their more enthusiastic supporters. Finally I came to the conclusion that it was my duty to give up my profession as a teacher of children and become a teacher of grown men and women. I decided to devote all my time and thought to the matter; so about 1850, with a slight tinge of regret, I gave up my chair and desk to take an active part in public life. The first struggle in which I took part on behalf of these doctrines was in the state convention of teachers. This was an important event, which for many years had been practically monopolized by men, and in which women were almost altogether debarred from participating. The struggle was a hard one, but as it progressed I gained friends and made converts. Then, as our numbers grew the conservative opposition reluctantly yielded, first one privilege and then another. Women were permitted to take part in the debates, to read essays, to speak, to vote and finally to hold honored positions as officers.

It seems a very easy matter to-day and a very small one, but forty years ago, if you had judged by the outcry of conservative elements in pedagogy, newspaperdom and society, you would have supposed that there was a revolution in progress which would soon consign things to the limbo of anarchy.

In 1852, through the influence and eloquence of Pilsbury, George Thompson, Wendell Phillips, Willam Lloyd Garrison and other noble-minded patriots, I began to realize that slavery was a national evil, and should be abolished at any price. I took so intense an interest in the problem that in 1856 I became one of the regular agents of the Anti-Slavery Society. I worked very hard in behalf of the cause. I was in fine physical condition at the time and was able to do any amount of work that would have been too much for a weaker organization. I spoke in churches, school houses, halls and barns; where I could get no room I have spoken in the open air from lumber wagons and dilapidated carts. I took part in public entertainments, held debates against pro-slavery editors and clergymen, addressed legislative assemblies, constitutional conventions and congressional committees. I was on the Columbia river in the days when you traveled in stage coaches and the railway had not yet knitted the entire continent together.

On one occasion I spoke in Michigan to the inmates of an institution for the deaf and dumb. It was a very queer experience. The superintendent stood by my side on the platform and as rapidly as I spoke transmitted my utterances into the sign language. I could see the effect far better upon their faces than upon those of men in possession of all their senses; tears, laughter, earnest attention, quick, nervous movements of the head and face, of the hands and even feet showed that every one of these poor unfortunates was completely absorbed in the remarks that I was making.

In 1872 I determined to test how far a woman could exercise the right of suffrage, and, having given notice, duly voted. The thing made a great stir and I was made a target from several thousand editorial anathemas. I was arrested as a common criminal and only escaped punishment by giving bonds. I was duly tried before a magistrate, who glared at me and said: "You voted as a woman, did you not?" as if to vote as a woman were a variety of high treason. "I replied, promptly: "No, sir; I voted as a citizen of the United States." It made no difference, however. They had to make an example of me, and they did. They found me guilty of I do not know what and fined me $100 and costs, with the alternative of going to jail to work out the fine. I was intensely indignant and said to the judge, "Resistance to tyranny is obedience to God and I shall never pay a penny of this unjust claim," and I never have, either. Strange to say, the judgment of the court awoke a strong feeling of sympathy on every hand and the magistrate and his friends, thinking discretion the better part of valor, never tried to execute the judgment of the court, but the poor inspectors who received the ballot were fined and imprisoned. They did not get any sympathy and so were compelled to bear the brunt of my deed. Nevertheless the moment we presented the facts before the president he pardoned them immediately.

In 1883 I found myself tired from overwork and recognized the pressing need of an entire change in the current of my life and thought, so I made my arrangements as rapidly as possible and took a trip to England and the continent, devoting myself, so far as the latter was concerned, to France, Germany and Italy. It was a very interesting chapter in my life and full of surprises of many sorts. On one occasion I was made to feel the difference between home and abroad in a very striking manner. While in Berlin at the residence of our minister, I innocently or thoughtlessly posted a lot of letters in the official envelopes of the Woman's Suffrage Association of America. On these were printed our principle, "No just government can be formed without the consent of the governed." The German officials saw these revolutionary documents with consternation, carefully held them for discussion and consideration, and, after the consumption of large quantities of red tape, returned them to me with the suggestion that such envelopes were contrary to law. I found out afterward that if I had not been a guest of the United States legation I should have been arrested as a socialist or anarchist or nihilist or disorderly character.

Another great change which comes home to me with ever increasing force is the attitude of my own sex in matters not only of suffrage but of all great public questions. Long ago it was an insignificant minority who bestowed any attention upon such subjects, while to-day I believe that a majority of American women hold that position. There was no organization and no women's clubs, and very few opportunities for women getting a higher education, much less a professional training. To-day they are organized in every part of the continent; there are women's clubs, attractive, intellectual, cultured and upright in every city and a hundred universities turn out not only sweet girl graduates, but also, scholarly and well-equipped women ready to enter the battle of life. The divulgence of these facts has been one of the happiest features of my work and travel in the past ten years. During that period I have been in many states and territories, and everywhere I have seen the same forces at work and the same condition of affairs coming into being.—Sarah B. Anthony, in Chicago Record.

MIRROR MAKING.

Short Talk on the Wonders of the Crafts.

A FOREST POOL THE FIRST MIRROR.

Vanity was Born when the Mirror was Discovered—Details of the Process of Manufacture.

In the days when society and clothing were little appreciated some heated man, in stooping to drink from a shady forest pool, saw a face in the water. After the first superstitious fear had been overcome he doubtless came again and again, each time with greater curiosity. Perhaps he also called the attention of his wife and daughters to the phenomenon, and as soon as they discovered that their own faces looked up at them from the water doubtless they began to think of rings for their noses. Thus vanity was born when the mirror was discovered.

Since that time mechanical skill has been engaged in providing portable substitutes for the shady pool according to the model which nature provided. First the mirror was a polished piece of metal, usually bronze, and then it was silver or brass. Everywhere the early society belle went she carried her mirror along with her in a little box which hung from her girdle. In some cases a slave was specially employed to keep it so highly polished that the reflection would be perfect. This use of metals continued until a comparatively recent time, and then some man who couldn't afford a piece of silver to look into devised a glass mirror. He found that the amount of metal required to make a thin coating on the glass was exceedingly small, and that its bright surface, being hermetically sealed by the presence of the covering of glass, did not require any polishing. From that time to the present the glass mirror has prevailed and the process of manufacturing has only varied in small details.

In the first place a mirror requires the finest kind of glass, without spot or speck or "blow-holes." The best work is done with the plate glass manufactured in St. Gobian, France, and in numerous cities of Belgium. All the largest manufacturers of mirrors use these foreign varieties in preference to those of American manufacture. The glass comes in huge plates, a quarter of an inch thick, ten or fifteen feet long, and half as broad. As many as a dozen plates are packed in a single box, displaying numerous warnings to "handle with care." When the glass is taken out it is covered with dust and bits of excelsior, and the first thing that is done is to wash it clean with water. Then a dozen men who know just how to handle a great piece of glass without subjecting any portion of it a to a breaking strain carry it into the cutting-room. Here a workman in a long leather apron—usually a Frenchman who has had great experience in foreign mirror manufactories—blocks out an order on the plate, say two or three beveled mirrors, for some lady's boudoir. A diamond-pointed instrument, with a strong and steady hand behind it, traces the lines of the drawings on the glass and cuts a groove so deep that the pieces easily crack out.

Each of these oval pieces is then borne into another room filled with the humming noises of rapidly moving machinery. A thin-faced foreign workman, with his sleeves rolled to the elbows and a ragged apron draping him from chin to toes, picks it up and places its edge upon the side of a swiftly revolving iron wheel. From a large wooden tank, which strongly resembles a New England ash-leah, a steady stream of sand and water flows upon the iron wheel, and in passing between it and the edge of the glass wears the bevel. The muddy water from the wheel is frequently thrown off in the swift revolutions and works polka-dot designs all over the operator. But he is a skilled workman and in his pride in getting the bevel on the glass exactly even—and he must depend wholly upon his eye—he doesn't pay any attention to the flying mud.

When the bevel is complete it resembles "mist" or ground glass and is full of scratches and rough places. The next workman in order smooths the bevel on a rapidly revolving emery wheel, which casts off a perfect shower of spraks. When it is as smooth as it can be made by this process it is passed to a third workman, who applies it to a fine grindstone from Newcastle, and in two minutes almost all traces of roughness have been removed. A small boy sits above the next wheel, which is made of wood, and daubs it with a wisp broom which he dips continually into a tub of water standing near at hand. He and the opreator are both covered with the thin gray fluid which the wheel throws off.

By the time the wooden wheel has been used the bevel to the ordinary eye looks as smooth as the other parts of the glass. But to the trained eye of the master workman, who has watched or flaws in glass since he was a child, it is far from perfect and he takes it in hand and passes the bevel swiftly over a wheel, which its smeared with ordinary rouge, such as the actress uses to make blushes on her cheeks. It may be imagined that this part of the shop has been well treaated with red—the men are all red, the floor is red, the tools are red and in passing through the department the visitor frequently acquires involuntary blushes. When the embryo mirror has passed the rouge wheel its bevel is perfect and it is sent on to an expert for inspection. If there are any remaining scratches on the glass they are marked with chalk and a workman with an old rag smeared with rouge rubs away until it is smooth and fine.

The glass is now ready for the silvering-room—a tight, hot, well-lighted apartment in which the workmen wear as little clothing as possible. An inclined plane of boards, which resembles a huge washboard turned on its side, fills one corner of the room, and on this the plates of glass are laid face downward. Over them the workman spouts a stream of water, which cleans off the dirt. Then with another hose he plays on the glass with a sensitizing solution of tin, the exact composition of which is a trade secret. The pieces of glass are next gathered up by a workman and are borne to the "bed."

While it is not provided with pillows the "bed" is complete in amost every other particular. It has a blanket which is strung across a frame about the size of an ordinary bed and over this a cotton sheet is stretched. Underneath, so that its surface just touches the blanket, there is a large vat of water kept hot by steampipes. The embryo mirrors are laid on the bed face down, and while they are yet wet with the sensiting solution a workman pours a diluted compound of nitrate of silver, ammonia and tartaric acid over each glass. The exact composition of this solution is also a trade secret, each firm having its own methods for mixing and each is certain that it cannot be beaten in results.

Assisted by the heat from below and by the tin solution the silver is quickly precipitated on the glass. When the workman in charge thinks the coating is thick enough he pours off the surplus of the silver solution, and the mirror—for it is no longer in an embryo state—is put into a warm "bed" to dry off. Here another workman takes the mirror and paints the back of it with a protective solution. Each firm has a different color of paint and each paint is usually of a composition differing from all the others, so that when a mirror is returned for resilvering the manufacturer can usually tell just what firm originally sent it out. Frequently, in special orders, the backs of mirrors are covered with felt.

The whole process in the silvering-room is wasteful of silver and many devices have been used to preserve all the metal possible. The blankets of the beds and the coverings of the tables where the nitrate of silver crystals are ground up go to the refineries for burning and about 20 per cent. of the silver is recovered.

The whole process of making a beveled mirror does not take to exceed an hour by the present methods and no stage is dangerous to the work men. When mercury and tin-foil were used a number of years ago the fumes killed many of the operatives and a mirror could not be completed under ten days.

A large mirror is much more difficult to make than a small one, owing to the difficulty of handling the somewhat fragile glass. The largest mirror ever made in Chicago—so say the manufacturers—was 18½ feet long by 8 feet broad and it was used in a liquor saloon. Two or three of the five large manufacturers of mirrors in Chicago use French glass almost entirely, for the reason they say, that it is much finer in quality and lacks the greenish tint which spoils American glass for the best trade. Chicago not only supplies the home market with mirrors but ships them all over the west and to Mexico, Canada and South America.

Making plain mirrors adds about 20 per cent. to the value of the plate glass, or in beveled work 30 per cent. For instance, a piece of plain French plate glass, 5 feet by 10 feet, would cost about $75. A plain mirror of the same size would sell for $90.—Chicago Record.

A DOLLAR A HEAD.

One of the police officers stationed at the City Hall had noticed a young man walking up and down the corridors the other day as if looking for something, and feeling pretty sure what was wanted he stopped the visitor and confidentially whispered:

"You want a marriage license, of course. Step right this way."

"But I don't want one," replied the young man.

Oh! I thought you did. Are you looking for anything in particular?"

Yes, sir. I'm looking for the hand-back office."

"Never heard of it. You must be mistaken in the name."

"Wall, mebbe, but I want a dollar I paid for a marriage license a month ago."

O-h-h! Then you did get a license?"

"Yes, sir."

"And the girl, she—"

"She was married to another fellow before I could get back with my paper."

"And you want—"

"Want my dollar and be hanged to her! If it hain't the hand-back office it's some other place. I don't keer what it is so long as I git my money back."

When the officer explained that no money paid for a marriage license was ever handed back, and that the county of Wayne, State of Michigan, U.S.A., was not financially responsible in case a girl went back on her troth, the victim leaned up against the wall and thought it over for awhile and finally said:

"Wall, they can't play no skin game on me! I've got an ole uncle whose goin' to marry a widder, and he'll gin me a calf worth $2 and change the names to suit. Tell your ole county of Wayne, State of Michigan and so forth, to go to Halifax and keep my dollar."—Detroit Free Press.

MATERNAL LOVE.

The Attachment of the Mother for Her Young.

A PRETTY STORY TOLD OF A STOAT.

Interesting Tale of Parental Devotion told of two Storks—A Cat's Show of Spirit in Protecting Kittens.

The devoted attachment of the mother for her young is known to exist in every range of life, a fact which proves that "self-preservation is not the first law of nature," for even the most fragile being which flees from men and other enemies disregards personal danger and will fight until death when the safety of its helpless offspring is concerned.

An adder would hardly be selected as a type of loving affection, yet we hear a story of one which, when approached, gave a fearful hiss, and at this signal four little adders instantly glided down her throat for protection. Waiting to shelter them from the menacing danger, she lost time in getting away, and the narrator of the story was able to kill her.

A pretty story is told of a stoat, which is a kind of weasel, seen by a huntsman running across a field from one cover to another with something in her mouth. She was too far away for a shot, but the sportsmans' retriever had noted her, and went off in hot pursuit. The stoat saw the dog coming at full speed, but she would not abandon the little one she carried even to save her own life, and when the dog was close upon her she seemed to think out a stratagem to save the life of the young creature. She hid it. Turning back across the field she lost her own life. On going to the spot where she was seen to have stopped, nothing could be seen, though the grass was short. After some search the tiny creature was discovered in a horse shoe impression, crouching timidly within the curve of the print. He lay there still as death and frightened, with his two little shining eyes fixed upon his captor, who picked him up and adopted him as a pet.

Another interesting tale of parental devotion is told of two storks, birds that are notedly fond of their young. During a storm a barn in the village of Lowenberg was set on fire by lightning and a nest containing two baby storks was threatened by the flames. The parents viewed the scene from a distance in great consternation, and after a little deliberation the mother bird took wing, darted into the nest, and, seizing one of the little birds in her beak, carried it off to a neighboring field. The father flew down to the little one and mounted guard while the mother returned for the other. When she arrived the flames were enveloping the nest and the young stork fell through the charred wood into the burning barn below. Nothing daunted the mother dashed though smoke and fire and returned bearing her second little stork in her beak, and then she flew away.

The next day some people in an adjacent village discovered a wounded stork. She was unable to stand, and on examining her both legs were found to be badly burned. This was the brave stork which had rescued her children. The bird was removed to the Rathhaus, and the burgomaster provided a bed for it and called in the physician, who attended the wounds. In the meantime the male stork ascertained her place of refuge and paid her daily visits to inquire for her condition and to bring reports after his own fashion of the young. The school children brought her food, the physician treated her every day until she recovered. Finally one bright morning she flew away with her devoted husband.

Cats show great spirit in protecting their kittens; there is no enemy that may approach a cat with her kittens, and remain unattacked. Once a cat was playing with her children about a barnyard, when suddenly a large hawk appeared on the scene, and seizing a kitten soared away. The mother cat gave a tremendous jump, caught the bird, and made it drop its prey. A dreadful battle ensued. The hawk fought with battling wings, sharp talons and crooked beak. Mrs. Puss used mouth and claws, and, though deprived of one eye, she struggled until she succeeded in breaking the hawk's wings, and finally laying it dead. Nearly exhausted and bleeding, she tore off her adversary's head in great delight, and, regardless of her sufferings, ran to the bleeding kitten, licked its wounds that the hawk's talons had made, and purred over the kitten with great content and happiness.

One of the most wonderful accounts of the maternal sagacity of horses occurred during a flood of the River Elbe. Instead of leaving their young, as did the cattle which swam to the mainland, a brood of mares that had been feeding in a meadow sought to preserve their foals. They stood close together, each two taking a little foal between them, and kept it lifted above the surface of the water. For six housr—until the flood subsided—the horses remained in this trying position, saving the valuable foals from a certain destruction, to the great surprise of the owners, who viewed this from a distance.

Lord Wolseley says that the most perfect description of a battle in the English language is the cavalry fight at Gettysburg in Captain Charles King's novel, "Between the Lines."

The amount of ice cut for use in Chicago every year is variously estimated at between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 tons. Thousands of men are now employed in the ice harvest.

FRIDAY, MARCH 15.....1895

The revival of interest in the great monetary problem of the age is apparent throughout the whole commercial, industrial and political world. Not a day passes now but some new movement is noted. The emphatic declaration of the Diet of the German empire in favor of convoking an international conference to consider measures for the restoration of bimetallism was followed by the adoption of sympathetic resolutions by several of the German states. Then came the somewhat unexpected action of the British House of Commons, which had the approval of the Rosebery Government. While the English assert that they intend to adhere to the gold standard in their own dealings, it is perfectly clear that the policy of attempting to force other nations to adopt gold monometallism has been abandoned. There is no doubt that the British Government and British financiers are ready to admit that the experiment of closing the mints of India to silver has proven a disasterous failure. The world need not be surprised to hear of an early proposition to reopen the Indian mints on condition that one or more of the countries to be represented in the conference will consent to restore silver coinage. That England will go this far is altogether likely, and it is within the possibilities that the active bimetallic propaganda in and out of parliament may force the government to agree to some international arrangement for the free coinage of both metals at an established ratio.

It is the opinion of R. P. Bland, the great silver advocate, that unless the financial question is settled in the next session of Congress, which is very improbable, the whole subject will go over to the people in 1896. The Presidential election will hinge upon this one issue. This is as it should be, for in the event of the issue being squarely made and passed on by the people, whatever settlement is made would be more likely to prove permanent than any patchwork gotten up to prevent submitting the question to the people. The silver question ought to be made the paramount issue of the election of 1896; so that its determination may be permanent, if possible. If the people want the single gold standard they will say so, if not they ought to decide it once for all. In the contest political parties as now organized will be sorely strained if not disrupted. It may be set down as certain that in both the Democratic and Republican parties are strong forces that will no longer submit to an evasion of this question. Both parties must come out in the open for or against silver restoration. Mr. Bland does not believe that the Democrats or Republicans in the agricultural and the mining states will support any platform or individual inimical to silver restoration. All the advantages of legislation are now with the advocates of gold They are, of course, quite anxious to avoid the issue, but from the present outlook this will be impossible.

It is significant that the "retrenchers" in the Assembly have cut the secret service fund of the Governor from $10 000 to $5000. It should be remembered that Governor Markham overdrew that fund several hundred dollars for the present fiscal year, and that Governor Budd has shown an energy in going after political rascals that bodes embarassment to a lot of influential gangsters in the g. o. p. Therefore, it is not surprising that his resources for following up rascality should be curtailed. It is really surprising that the Republican "retrenchers" did not take it all and give it to their attaches.

The amendment offered by Assemblyman Powers enabling the San Francisco Harbor Commissioners to lease fifty acres of water front on Mission Bay, is an indication that the projectors of the San Joaquin Valley Railroad do not intend to make Oakland their terminus and it is also an indirect indication that the line of road will be through Santa Clara over the Pacheco pass route instead of across the Livermore plains.

WHAT IS YOUR ROTATION?

Is It Adapted to Your Soil, Climate and Your Markets?

There is room for divergence of opinion as to what rotation is the most profitable, but in most sections good farmers have rotations especially adapted to their own farms. These may be short or long, and usually in any country or section the older the country the longer the rotation. Almost all farmers everywhere have a rotation such as this: Corn, and oats and then corn, or corn, oats and wheat, and then corn. Others again have corn, oats, wheat, meadow, pasture and then corn. In many sections of this country this is not a bad one, but a writer in the Iowa Homestead points out the fact that a rotation is not a good one unless it provides for the maintenance of soil fertility, and he knows of no country in which this has been done without the use of the legumes, such as clover, beans or peas. He says:

In sections where either fall or spring wheat grows well, and where stock growing and feeding is one of the main features of the farm, the rotation of corn on sod, oats, spring or fall wheat, clover and timothy for meadow, then pasture one to two years, and then back to corn, is a very desirable one. It provides in corn a heed, or, we should rather say a cultivated, crop on land which has an abundance of vegetable matter in that state of decomposition in which the roots of corn luxuriate, and in the corn growing sections it is generally wise to follow corn with corn, thus securing two heavy crops from rich soil. Beyond this it is not wise to go, as the corn root worm will inevitably appear and decrease the crop in ordinary years from 10 to 25 per cent.

Oats can then be sown without plowing, and, as a rule, to better advantage without plowing than with it. Where wheat is a profitable crop in ordinary years, grass seed may then be sown, and if seed is not too high it will pay to sow it anyhow, even if it is to be plowed under in the fall for a crop of winter wheat. This, again, furnishes the best nurse crop for the grasses, insuring a stand in ordinary seasons, and the meadows treated in this way furnish an excellent crop of hay, and, if clover predominates, a crop of seed. Where timothy is not sown with clover it is best to go back to corn after a clover seed crop, thus making a short four years' rotation, but where there is no pasture except that furnished by fields in the rotation it is wise to sow timothy and pasture one or two years before going back to corn.

Potatoes In Succession.

There are other reasons besides the danger of propagating the potato disease why it is not best to plant potatoes two succeeding years on the same land. Explains American Cultivator: The great necessity for a large potato crop is an abundant supply of moisture in the soil. Nothing so well secures this as a clover ley plowed early enough in spring to get the advantage of late spring rains. It is true that when clover is allowed to grow in the spring there is a great mass of green herbage to be plowed under in late May or early June. But the moisture that is in the clover leaves has all been taken from the soil and much more, for the clover plant, with its broad leaves, exhales moisture rapidly, as any one who has plowed under a growth of clover in June well knows. Even as quickly as 48 hours after a very heavy rain heavy soil will often become hard to plow.

When clover is plowed so late, the soil often remains dry till the season if summer rains are light. The same cloverfield plowed in early spring will keep moist all summer. What clover there is rots quickly, and this keeps the soil loose, so that every rainfall sinks into it instead of running off. The soil where potatoes grew the year before either has better vegetable matter or the plowing is delayed so late for it to grow that much of its benefit for that year must be lost. This may prove to be one of the drawbacks to the advantages expected from sowing crimson clover to cover the soil in winter and be plowed under in spring for potatoes. There will be some profit, but it will not be as great as is commonly supposed.

Exhibit of Irrigation Machinery.

The exhibit of machinery for raising water made at the irrigation convention in Hutchinson, Kan., demonstrated that at least in the Arkansas bottoms a big ditch full of water can be provided without very expensive appliances. Pumps were there each throwing 4,000 gallons of water per minute. These were each driven by a common thrasher's engine. There were also smaller machines doing proportionately heavy work. There were gasoline engines of several makes, all doing excellent work in the operation of pumps. Without doubt the use of these engines is to be greatly increased, where a supply of water is desired, without fail, at the time most needed, and where the quantity must be above the capacity of the windmill and below 10 or 15 horsepower. Windmills were there in great numbers and variety, and they received merited attention. The beginner at irrigation first thinks of the wind as the most desirable motive power, and there is no doubt about the practicability of irrigating considerable areas, and especially gardens, by the use of wind power.

Feeding Low Priced Grains.

From the Kansas state board of agriculture comes an important summary of the methods of feeding wheat and low priced grains to animals. The report covers detailed experiences of farmers all over the country, and the conclusion is that farmers are justified in feeding their animals wheat when so cheap, and that despite some unfavorable reports the practice as a general thing is wise. In many localities it is the only profitable disposition of the low priced grain this year that can be made, and when wisely and intelligently fed it makes money for the farmer.

Dressing Poultry For Market.

In reply to a western correspondent the Iowa Homestead submitted the following method of dressing and shipping for market: Keep the birds without food for 24 hours previous to killing. Kill by bleeding in the mouth. Hang by the feet until properly bled. Leave head and feet on, and do not remove intestines or crop. Scalded chickens sell best to home trade and dry picked best to shippers, so that either manner of dressing will do, if properly done. For scalded chickens the water should be as near the boiling point as possible without boiling. Pick the legs dry before scalding. Hold by the legs and head and immerse and lift up and down three times. If the head is immersed, it turns the color of the comb and gives the eyes a sunken appearance, which leads buyers to think the fowl has been sick.

The feathers and pinfeathers should then be removed immediately, very cleanly and without breaking the skin. Then "plump" by dipping ten seconds in water nearly or quite boiling hot and then immediately into cold water. Hang in a cool place until the animal heat is entirely out. To dry pick chickens properly the work should be done while the chickens are bleeding. Do not wait and let the bodies get cold. Dry picking is much more easily done while the bodies are warm. Be careful and do not break and tear the skin. In dressing turkeys observe the same instructions as are given for preparing chickens, but always dry pick. Dressed turkeys, when dry picked, always sell best and command better prices than scalded ones.

Cold Frames and Greenhouses.

Plants that are being wintered in cold frames must be kept at a standstill until spring. On warm sunny days some ventilation may be necessary to prevent the plants from starting into life. A little airing in winter, however, will usually go a great way. One way to gain ventilation is by raising the head of the sashes just a trifle and placing little blocks of wood under them, thus holding them up at that end only two or three inches above the frame.

Available space in the greenhouse may be profitably filled with lettuce, parsley and the like. On dark days evaporation is slow and comparatively little water is needed. Keep a look out for the green fly.

CRUZ—At Lone Pine, Cal. March 10, 1895 to Mr. and Mrs. D. R. Cruz, twins.

MCKEEN—At Bishop March 3, 1895, to Mr. and Mrs. E. E. McKeen a daughter.

The Independence school closes two weeks from to-day.

J. D. Lewis Esq., returned to Bishop yesterday morning after a weeks visit at Independence.

Coleman "stood in" with the Southern Pacific Railroad on its pet measure, the "anti-scalpers" bill.

The Milton school has closed for the term and the teacher, Miss Eva McGee has returned to her home at Bishop.

The footrace between Tom Morris of Santa Ana and El Ober of Big Pine was won easily by Morris. The race was 75 yards for $500 a side.

P. W. Forbes Esq. recently purchased a lot on Edwards street north of Judge Gill's residence, which he has had leveled and made ready for building upon.

Pasted a dime on a sheet of paper and send to Crocker & Ames, 619 Montgomery St., San Francisco, for Ame's Shoe Protector, the wonderful saver of shoes.

The Spring Zephyr has had a tinge of winter the past few days. It has been sufficiently cold to hold the blossoms back for a week or two, which is a fortunate occurrence.

Lone Pine will celebrate St. Patricks day with a grand ball next Monday evening. The Mexican String Band will furnish the music. An enjoyable time will surely be had.

Ben H. Yandell was examined by Judge Arnot yesterday and admitted to practice law in the Superior Court. Ben has designs on the Supreme Court, which judging from the success he met with yesterday, should prove successful.

J. J. Smith came down from Bishop last week with a load of sample brooms of his own manufacture. Joe makes a good article. He has located a forty-acre tract of land on which to establish his plant. It is a valuable home industry that should be encouraged.

The sporting delegation from Santa Ana departed for fresh pastures on Wednesday. Tom Morris goes to Bakersfield, where there is reported to be an Oregon sprinter, and Clampett and Schroeder to Ventura, where Clampett says there are lots of suckers.

Water System For Owens Valley.

The Producer, Los Angeles Cal. contains the following:—For three years past Frederick Stock has been at work on a water system for Owens Valley. About a year ago there was incorporated in the city of London, under his direction, the Califordia Water Works and Irrigation Company, Limited, with a board of directors consisting of The Right Honorable Earl of Kilmorey, Sir James D. McKenzie, Bart, Charles Bradley, Esq., W. D. Gillies, Esq., and W. D. Nesbit M. Inst. C. E., J. P. The company has just got ready this month to call in $500,000 by the issuance of 7 per cent. debenture bonds, and a representative of the company will be in Los Angeles about the middle of March to arrange for actively pushing the work of the company. In the meantime a contract was let last season for constructing the first eighteen miles of the canal which will be fifty-three feet wide on the bottom and will carry water eight feet deep, having a carrying capacity of 1000 cubic feet per second, 50,000 inches, the grade being six inches to the mile. Work on the canal has not been pushed, only about 150,000 cubic yards of earth having been as yet moved, but the force will soon be increased to one hundred teams, and the first eighteen miles will be completed by the first of June. The water for this system is taken from the Owens river north of Independence, and the canal will be about ninety miles long, the objective point being the Indian Wells valley where a large body of land will be made valuable by the system. Water will also be furnished for working the Goler placer mines.

Change Of Observers.

A change is to be made in the personnel of the local Weather Bureau. W. C. McGuiness has received orders to report at San Francisco for duty and H. C. Wilkinson will take charge here. Mr. Wilkinson was formerly in charge at Keeler and is well and favorably known in Owens Valley. He is expected to arrive here on Monday's train and Mr. McGinnis will probably leave a week later. The latter gentleman will take with him the good wishes of many friends whom he has made during his short sojourn here.

To whom It May Concern.

Notice is hereby given that I will not be responsible for any debts contracted by my son Albert Aguirre, a minor. And all parties are notified not to give him credit on my account.

BENIGNO AGUIRRE.

Dated March 14. 1895

STRAYED—A pair of gray horses, one of them branded with an anchor on the right shoulder, the other SP on the left hip. Any person knowing the whereabouts of same please leave word at this office or with Dr. Woodin. When last seen, about the 6th of March, they were at the Moffit ranch at Georges Creek.

W. L. Zimmerman came down from Bishop on Wednesday's train and will make his future home at Independence. He has rented Davis' shoeshop and will be ready on Saturday to do all kinds of boot and shoe repairing. Gather up your work and have it ready.

Will P. Williams a brother of Ben T. Williams, died at Decatur, Texas on February 20th of heart disease. Mr. Williams was a graduate of the University of Virginia and bore an enviable reputation among his associates as a cultured man. He has a number of relatives in Owens Valley, who will be deeply grieved at his unexpected death.

The Legislature has passed a bill appropriating $275,000 to pay claims for coyote scalps. The bill has not yet been signed by the Governor. A bill has also been passed appropriating $196,000 for District Fairs.

District Attorney Forbes has been in the north end of the valley during the week. There were two cases of malicious mischief at Bishop and a case of Chinaman, Indian and whiskey at Big Pine.

A Marvellous Showing.

The U. S. Government, through the Agricultural Department, has been investigating the baking powders for the purpose of informing the public which was the purest, most economical and wholesome.

The published report shows the Royal Baking Powder to be a pure, healthful preparation, absolutely free from alum or any adulterant, and that it is greatly stronger in leavening power than any other brand.

Consumers should not let this valuable information, official and unprejudiced, go unheeded.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 WALL ST., NEW-YORK.

JAY GOULD'S GREAT WEALTH.

The personal estate left by the late Jay Gould is much greater than was supposed at the time of his death. The estimate made in 1892 placed the value of his estate at $72,000,000. The report of the appraiser appointed by the Surrogate to pass upon the taxation value of the estate makes it worth $80,934,580.79. The value of Mr. Gould's realty was about $2,000,000.

Of this immense estate almost $19,000,000 was in Western Union stocks, more than $12,000,000 was in Manhattan Elevated Railroad stocks, and about $9,000,000 was in Missouri Pacific turst bonds at 89. Missouri Pacific stocks at 54 and St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern bonds at 83¼ were the next largest holdings. Of the twenty-nine different lines of stocks held only four were valueless. The box at the Metropolitan Opera House was put at $5,000, the steam yacht Atlanta at $100,000 and the contents of his Fifth avenue home at $146,488. The stable was valued at $2,000 and the country place at Irvington at $117,539.

The $600,000 paid into the Surrogate's Court soon after the will was admitted to probate will probably cover the entire tax schedule, which provides for a one per cent. standard on all amounts over $10,000. If anything, the executors will get some of the $600,000 back instead of paying an additional $200,000. The appraiser allows an indebtedness of $6,000,000 to George J. Gould, which is in the nature of a $500,000 yearly salary for twelve years, offered by the testator for the devotion of his sons' entire time to his, the testator's business affairs.

Besides a legal contract for this salary, the testator left a memorandum of the indebtedness with Judge Dillon. After paying all debts, annuities, etc., the value of the residuary estate is $73,224,547.08. Each of Mr. Gould's six children is entitled to a life interest, in trust, with the remainder to their children. Under a recent decision of the Court of Appeals these remainders are not liable to taxation.

CHAPTER I.

"What p'int air yer atmin' fur, stranger?"

The period of the early settlement of Kansas is replete with excitement and interest to the lover of history. When the question as to whether Kansas was to be a free or a slave state was left to the people settling within her borders, there was a wild inrushing of souls from both north and south, bringing with them their strongest sectional prejudices. Each element was aggressively determined to establish political supremacy on those untamed prairies of the buffalo and the Indian, and when those feelings, so widely different, clashed, as a natural consequence bloodshed resulted, and Kansas was given a title, not of her own choosing, "Bloody."

After the war, in the latter part of the sixties, a great influx of immigration set into Kansas. These settlers came from many different states, and were more the true homeseekers, in the broad sense of the term, than the classes first referred to in this tale.

It was a balmy spring day in 1868 that a large, heavily loaded wagon, covered with thick canvas and drawn by an ill matched team, moved slowly along the old military road, about thirty-five miles south of Fort Scott. The "off horse" was a large, bony black, while his mate was a rough coated, jaded looking gray mule, whose appearance might have suggested service in the days of Methuselah.

The spring seat of the "prairie schooner" was occupied by as oddly an assorted pair as the team which drew them southward over the billowy plain.

The driver, Adam Hamlet, was a man about forty-five years of age. He was a hunchback, his body thick set and his legs diminutive in size and length. His broad though misshapen shoulders supported a large head, covered with reddish brown hair; his eyes looked like two bright blue beads, while his mouth suggested a humming bird's nest in a thicket, all but hidden as it was in the bushy growth of whiskers that fortified the entire lower part of his face. His clothing was made of coarse jeans, and his feet were incased in rusty, cowhide boots, one of which he had elevated upon the dashboard.

The man's companion, the sole one who had shared his long travels in the covered wagon, was his daughter Nancy, a tall, slender girl of eighteen, in whose pretty pink cheeks, hazel eyes and dark tresses could be traced a strong resemblance to the mother who had been left behind in a little country graveyard.

The Hamlets were originally from Tennessee, but for the past five or six years had been living near relatives in that part of Illinois which is locally designated as "Egypt." But the death of his two youngest children, followed soon by the wife, made him dissatisfied with the locality, and putting his only remaining child, Nancy, with their lighter household goods, into the wagon, he had set his face westward with the purpose to take up "the burden of life again" out in Kansas.

Before leaving "Egypt" Adam Hamlet had met a claim holder who was homesick, and desired to sell or trade his prairie land in the wild west. By turning over a few head of cattle Hamlet came into possession of a claim which he had never seen—a very unbusinesslike way of doing things; but as all his neighbors vouched for the man's honesty Hamlet decided to run the risk.

With explicit directions from the previous owner, the settler was now on his way to the southeastern part of the state, where the claim was located.

Hamlet was of a most genial disposition, despite his somewhat unfavorable appearance, and as they journeyed over the seemingly endless plains the girl's eyes would ever and again turn toward her deformed parent, and rest upon him with an expression of protective tenderness and the utmost filial affection.

"We kain't reach the claim tonight, pap, I reckon," she remarked, after a silence.

"No, I reckon we kain't, Nancy," he answered, looking before them down the road. "We must be nigh erbout thirty mile yit from ther claim, ef I hain't missed my calkerlations."

"Yes, an' Pete and Molly ac's as ef they was jest erbout tuckered out," Nancy said pityingly.

"Yes, I 'low they air."

"Bein' as we kain't git to Deer creek tonight, we best go into camp airly, an' give the beasts a good rest," said the girl.

"Yes, we will, Nancy. Yer see that patch o' timber lyin' erhead o' us?"

"Jest over Pete's right ear?"

"Yes; thet's the patch. I 'low we'll find a creek thar, an' wood ter cook our supper by. We'll camp thar."

They drove along in silence for some time, during which the girl's intelligent hazel eyes were kept busy observing the strange forms of nature around them.

The prairies were covered with a carpet of tender green grass, eastarred thickly with deer tongues and other wild flowers which accompany the renewal of the year in Kansas. Yellow breasted larks sang blithe welcomes to the newcomers from some dead indigo or iron weed hard by the roadside, while red birds darted like a flame across their way, and perched on a last year's sunflower stalk, trilling notes of silvery sweetness. Occasionally a huge jackrabbit would go leaping away with erect ears across the rolling plain, and coyotes might be seen hovering along the brow of a ravine howling dismally.

"It's plumb wild lookin' out hyer in Kansas, ain't it, pap?" the girl remarked.

"Yes, I'm erfeard, too, yer goin' ter git powerful homesick out hyer," answered Adam Hamlet.

"No, I ain't aimin' to git homesick, pap. It'll be plumb different, I know, from livin' ermong friends; but we've come out hyer to make us a home of our own, an' I ain't goin' to git homesick." And she set her lips firmly, as was Nancy Hamlet's habit when summoning her forces of resolution.

"God bless yer, Nancy! Yer a brave one, an' I don't know how I'd ever git erlong without yer," said Adam in a fond tone.

"Jest see the posies an' the purty birds! I hain't goin' to be without friends with such company as them to cheer me out hyer," she said in a cheerful voice.

That evening they encamped on the banks of a small, thinly wooded stream. While Hamlet attended to the tired team Nancy gathered some dry twigs, with which she soon had a fire started. Then she put on larger sticks, and when she had secured a good bed of coals she went to the stream, filled the tea kettle with water and fixed it to boil. This done, she went to the larder in the wagon, cut several slices of bacon, prepared a large pan of fresh biscuits and was flitting around her camp fire like a veritable sylvan nymph of cookery.

Hamlet had picketed his animals to graze on the delicious grass along the creek, and had just come back to the wagon when a horseman came riding toward the camp.

In the roseate tints of sunset Hamlet saw that the stranger was a young man of about twenty-six, handsome and straight as a pine. He wore a semi-Indian suit of fancifully fringed leather, and his light curly hair reached to his massive shoulders from under his wide sombrero.

He rode up to the wagon and halted before Adam.

"Good evening, stranger!" he greeted the mover.

"Good evenin', sir!" returned the hunchback, looking admiringly at the stranger's fine pony and tasteful equipments.

"What p'int air yer aimin' fur, stranger?" asked the horseman, his blue eyes following the movements of Nancy as she busied herself with the cooking over the little camp fire, just beyond the spot where he had reined in. He could not help thinking what a pleasant picture the girl made in her dark calico dress and large checked apron, while the aroma of the coffee and frying bacon which rose on the prairie air was very alluring, indeed, to a vigorous, hungry man.

"I be aimin' fur Cherokee county," answered Hamlet.

"Yer don't say!"

"Yes; I've swapped fur a claim down ther."

"Wherbouts?"

"On a stream thet's called Deer creek."

"Well, I'm glad o' that. I live nigh Deer creek myself."

"Thet so?" and Hamlet regarded his future neighbor with fresh interest.

"Yes, I have a cattle ranch near the Neosho river, 'bout five miles southwest o' Deer creek. Wher yer from, stranger?"

"From Illinoy."

"I understood yer ter say as yer'd swapped fur somebody's claim down ther. Who did yer swap with?"

"Ik Pender."

"Great Scott! Has Ik left ther country fur good an' swapped off his claim?"

"Yes, there's no doubt about it, sir, fur we made a fair an' squar' trade, as my darter Nancy thar can testify."

"I ain't a-doubtin' yer word, stranger, at all. Only Ik had a mighty val'able piece o' sile on Deer creek, and it didn't never seem as ef he keered to part with it."

"Waal, yer see Pender come back to his folks purty homesick, an' hearin' of my wantin' to go out to Kansas, he jest up an' offered to make a swap of his claim for some stock I had. So the land, yer say, is val'able?"

"Yes, Ik Pender's claim is the best on Deer creek. But yer hev no writin's to prove the claim's yers, hev yer?"

"Nothin' only Ik Pender's own writin' to say ther swap is genywine. He said he hadn't never contracted fer the claim."

"No, fur I reckon Ik, like some other chaps I know, wasn't keerin' to hev the land leaguers git up a necktie social fur his special benefit."

"The land leaguers? What's them?"

"Ther settlers who contend thet congress has no right to sell the lands ter some ole monopolist, but thet they hev a plumb right to pre-empt any homestead, an' pay a little fee ter our government for their places, 'ste'd o' a big pile to some individual who has bought the privilege of disposing of what's called the neutral lands."

"I never heerd nothin' o' these leaguers before."

"Well, they've been a-threatenin' fur some spell what they'd do ef congress done that way with the lands, an' hev been stirred up considerable. But it's just lately thet they're callin' meetin's at the settlers' cabins and organizin' leagues. Thar's a heap of excitement out hyer, stranger, over these neutral lands."

"I reckon they won't trouble me."

"Ef they do, Tom Byers will see yer safe through. I'm not a leaguer nur a anti-leaguer; I jest reserve ther right to act as I please, as any free American citizen ought to do."

"Thet's me, too, Mr. Byers. But won't yer lite, give yer beast a rest, an' take supper with us?"

"Thank yer, I don't keer if I do," and he threw himself from the saddle and began preparations to lariat his pony. "I'm goin' to ride on ter Fort Scott tonight, fur I've got ter be thar on important business in the morning, but I reckon Pop corn an' me kin travel all ther faster after a little rest hyer along with you uns. But what's yer name, stranger?"

"Hamlet—Adam Hamlet. Hyer, Nancy, this gentleman is Mr. Byers, who lives near Deer creek, wher we air bound fur, an' he's goin' ter stay fur supper."

To Tom Byers it was the most delightful supper he had eaten since he had left his mother and sisters back in Kentucky. There was a vast and an agreeable difference to him in stowing away food which a pretty girl had prepared from having to fare morning, noon and night on hard, tough biscuits and meat burnt to a scrap.

Tom gave the newcomers much interesting information about the country and settlers where they expected to establish their home. He nearly forgot his business to Fort Scott as he sat on a log in the little woodland, answering the fair Nancy's questions. But when the moon rose and began to shed her silvery luster over the prairies, he mounted Popcorn and rode reluctantly away from the little camp fire where some witchery had seemed to enchain him.

Quiet brooded over the camp of the tired travelers, and they soon slept soundly. But Tom Byers pursued his lonely journey, the music of a new, sweet voice ringing in his heart, while a pair of wondrous hazel eyes smiled at him from every moonbeam that darted across his path.

Bright and early the next morning Hamlet and his daughter resumed their journey southward.

The man seemed inclined to bestow much praise on their acquaintance of the preceding night, but Nancy was entirely non-commital regarding the opinion which she had formed of the young ranchman.

When they reached the Cherokee county line they left the military road which led to Baxter Springs, and took a rough wagon trail that zigzagged across the prairie in a southwesterly direction toward the Neosho river.

At four o'clock that evening they halted before a log cabin, where Joe Dugan, a primitive Kansan, having settled there in 1857, kept a country postoffice, to which the mail was carried once a week from Baxter Springs, nearly twenty miles distant.

Adam Hamlet presented his note of introduction from Ik Pender, and Joe Dugan and his wife came out to the wagon and talked in a most friendly manner for more than an hour.

When the travelers were ready to start on, they having declined the Dugans' pressing invitation to stay overnight at their cabin, the old borderman said:

"Well, seein' yer won't stay with us, I'll put Ned on the pony an' let him 'scort yer ter ther claim. Deer creek's erbout four miles furder on; but Ned knows Pender's place like a book, fur many's the day the boy's spent with Pender in his dugout when the huntin' was extry."

Under the guidance of Ned Dugan, a strapping youth of seventeen, the Hamlets reached their claim on Deer creek just before the sun had dropped below the tree tops along the Neosho river.

Deer creek was a prairie stream, with thickets of wild plum and blackberry vines along its banks, with now and then a cottonwood or a wild cherry tree to break the monotony. It took a southwesterly course, flowing into the Neosho about six or seven miles from Hamlet's claim.

There were no cabins on the stream, and a rude rock chimney protruding from a high bank and showing above the tall prairie grass proclaimed the situation of the dugout, which was to be their habitation for the present at least.

"Well, I'm plumb glad ter git hyer at last, pap, ef it is only a dugout," Nancy remarked with a sigh of relief as the tired team halted before the habitation, hollowed out of the side of a steep bank. There was a smooth bank about eighteen feet wide, hard as a floor, right before the dugout door, and sloping very gradually to the little creek bed below.

"I'm afeared yer goin' ter find it mighty rough livin' in a dugout, Nancy," said Hamlet as he inspected the anything but cleanly interior.

"Oh, I'll slick it up a heap, pap," said the girl, who had followed him inside, "till it'll look plumb different. It's home, pap, an' thet means a sight to folks like us, who hain't hed one o' ther own fur a long spell."

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

The project of the Nicaragua Canal has been debated in the U. S. Senate very vigorously. One thing should be remembered about that climate, it is death to almost every foreigner who goes there, and laborers especially succumb. It is said that the Panama Railroad cost a life for every tie. What an idea of pains and aches is in this sentence. It is mostly due to carelessness. Every laborer provided with St. Jacobs Oil would be armed against these troubles. Men's muscles there are cramped with rheumatic pain, and they ache all over. That's just the condition where this sovereign remedy can do its best work. The fearful malady is very much like the breakbone fever in certain parts of America.

Money makes the mare go, but if you haven't got the money, education, energy and character make an excellent substitute.

LUCK WITH BECK.

TRIES AN OUTSIDE ISSUE TO GET MONEY.

Persuaded by Friends to Try His Fortune in the Old, Reliable Honduras National Lottery, He Draws a Prize—Appreciates the Prompt Manner in Which His Ticket was Honored—Will Invest in Real Estate.

Hugo Beck is a member of the firm of Beck Brothers, wholesale liquor dealers at 308 North Franklin street. Last month trade was rather dull and Mr. Beck conceived the idea of increasing his personal bank account by outside speculation. Several means suggested themselves, but each required a considerable outlay of money. After juggling his brain for some time a friend suggested a lottery ticket as the best investment for a small amount of money, and Mr. Beck, acting on the advice, purchased a one-fifth ticket in the old reliable Honduras National Lottery. It was his first experience with a lottery company and it required much persuasion on the part of Mr. Beck's friends to cause him to buy the ticket. The same friends were compelled to urge Mr. Beck to scan the official list of the drawing to ascertain if his ticket had drawn a prize. Fortune had been kind to the liquor dealer, and he learned that his ticket, No. 91,161, had drawn one-fifth of the third capital prize of $10,000.

Overjoyed, he informed all of his friends of his good fortune, and the lucky ticket was sent to the company for payment.

To-day the money arrived, and when Mr. Beck was seen by a reporter for The Dispatch, he was, indeed, a happy man. Mr. Beck is a man who understands the value of a dollar and desires to state that he will invest the sum secured in real estate.

"It was just like finding it," he said, in talking to the reporter. "The company promptly cashed the ticket, and I shall try my luck again."—Chicago (Ills.) Dispatch.

OIL OF LAVENDER.

The production of lavender for distillation is an important branch of the industry. In the county of Surrey, England, there are several large lavender distilleries. To these the growers carry their harvestings, to be subject to the necessary process. The oil is contained in glands situated chiefly on the calyx, corrolla and leaves, but also to a less extent on the branches and flower stalks. In the process of distillation two hours are allowed for the first "run." This run gives the clearest and best oil, and when of a very high quality it is almost colorless. For the second run four hours are allowed, the oil produced being of a pale amber tint and having a stronger, coarser odor than that which results from the first run.

When the highest quality of oil is desired, flowers only are used in the process. The quality of the oil secured depends also on the kind of season in which the flowers have been grown. Sunless summers result in a much reduced quantity and inferior quality. There are many acres of land throughout the kingdom, producing at present only a scanty crop of grass, which might be used for the cultivation of the lavender plant. The demand for it is practically unlimited, and there is, therefore, little danger of its being produced in such quantities that the price would fall below a remunerative level.

"Mary Jane," said the rector, solemnly, "the stake is cooked to a crisp and the potatoes are raw. You have left undone the things that ought to be done, and cooked too done the things that ought not be done."

WOMEN PREACHERS.

A Product of the Nineteenth Century.

ELOQUENT, PROGRESSIVE IDEAS.

One Hundred Who Ably Direct Congregations from American Pulpits—Enthusiastic in Their Work.

Women ministers are distinctly a product of the advanced period of the nineteenth century, and it is a remarkably significant fact that whereas thirty years ago there was not one ordained woman minister in the United States, it is probable that to-day there are about one hundred. The State of New York has a fair proportion of these, although the most fertile field for a woman preacher thus far seems to be in the West. New York city has not, so far as can be discovered just now, a woman in pastoral charge of any church, although at least one prominent regularly ordained minister lives here and has but recently relinquished active charge of a congregation.

It is to Brooklyn that Gotham must at present yield the palm in this matter, for in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, lives Mrs. Wright, who is an ordained minister of the Universalist Church and is in active charge of a flock. Still better, not only is Mrs. Wright a minister, but her husband is also a reverend of the same denomination, Rev. A. E. Wright, and both husband and wife are devoted and enthusiastic in their work and pursue their theological studies along harmonious lines that are not disturbed by any questions of supremacy or difference of belief.

The state of affairs over in Brooklyn is very interesting. There are two churches over which Rev. Wright and his equally reverend wife preside, and they alternate in their discourses quite frequently. It should be remembered that this instance of Rev. and Mrs. Wright is not one of a pastor and his assistant, but distinctly that of two regularly ordained ministers of the gospel, with equal powers, the right to preach, perform the marriage ceremony, administer the ordinance of baptism and communion and all the sacraments of the church

The couple make a most interesting pair. Mrs. Wright herself is a woman calculated to put to flight the ordinary jest on the advanced woman, for she is both young and pretty, with that elusive feminine charm which makes a man speak of a woman as "womanly." She does not appear to be more than 35, is unassuming in dress and attractive in manner, and has that way about her which readily leads one to understand that she would be a most welcome visitor in the sick room or where sorrow and mourning were.

The harmony of the work of Mrs. Wright and her husband has helped to make them very strong in the community, where their work has been very successful, and where they are greatly beloved by their parishioners. Mrs. Wright is a woman of more than ordinary mentality, and was graduated with honors. It is interesting to notice that it seems as though the Universalist Church is in the lead in the number of women ministers, as compared with other denominations, for their statistics show that they have forty or more out of a possible hundred in the United States.

This denomination has two well-known theological schools connected with its universities—at the St. Lawrence University, Canton, N. Y., and Lombard University, at Galesburg, Ill. In both of these universities women are admitted to exactly the same course of theology as the men and are regularly ordained.

At least two Protestant denominations refuse to ordain women, and will not even license them to preach—the Episcopalian and the Presbyterian. In the Episcopal Church the nearest approach to the ministry is the order of Deaconesses, but they are never allowed to speak in the pulpit The Presbyterian Church is now on record as being very much opposed to women ministers, and though here and there may be found an occasional liberal spirit, the ministry of women in that denominaiton is reserved for future history.

The Methodist Episcopal Church licenses women to preach, but will not ordain them. It is due to this fact that Frances Willard, the well-known head of the W. C. T. U., is not to-day a minister of the gospel. Miss Willard has for years desired to be ordained, but her chosen church refuses her as a pastor, and yet many of the prominent divines of that denomination are proud to have her occupy their pulpits on occasions, and all those who know Frances Willard know that she is not only eloquent on the platform and in the pulpit, but that she is admirably adapted for pastoral work.

By all means the most distinguished and prominent woman minister of the United States is Rev. Phoebe A. Hannaford, of New York City, who for almost thirty years has been ordained minister in successful charge of a number of congregations. Dr. Hannaford is a member of Sorosis, and a well-known writer and lecturer as well as minister. She has the honor to be the pioneer of women in the sacred desk in this country, as she was the first ordained woman minister in America and the fourth in the world.

Other early and prominent women ministers in the history of the pulpit in this country are Antoinette Brown Blackwell, Lucy Stone's sister; Rev. Augusta Chapin, of the Universalist Church, and the first woman doctor of divinity from a Western college, now located at Denver; Rev. Olympia Brown, Universalist, now at Racine, Wis., Dr. Brown, now a widow, was married to Mr. John Henry Willis, but, like Lucy Stone, she always kept her own name even during her husband's lifetime.

Statistics seem to be more or less elusive in some denominations, but it is known that the Unitarians have at least seven or eight women preachers, perhaps a dozen:

There is probably not a better known woman in the country than Rev. Anna Howard Shaw, and she, like Frances Willard, has been rejected by the Methodist Episcopal Church for ordination. After a long and futile struggle to be ordained in the church of her choice Miss Shaw, with that virile determination which has marked her entire career, left that denomination and went into the Methodist Protestant Church, where she became the first regularly ordained woman minister of that denomination. Miss Shaw has had a very successful career as a pastor in several churches, including a seven years' pastorate at Cape Cod. Miss Shaw is brainy, witty, clever in argument, and quick as a flash at repartee, and she is not slow at times to indulge in a little gentle railliery against church prejudice. It was not long ago that she said in an address: "The claim is sometimes made that every woman who is a suffragist is an infidel. Now the way of it is this: As soon as we begin to get progressive the church says we are heretics; when they cry 'Heretic!' they put us out, and when they have put us out they say we are infidels!"

Miss Shaw is not at present in charge of a congregation, her eloquence and progressive ideas having brought her the offer of national lecturer for the National American Suffrage Association, and to accept that she resigned her charge. It seems quite superfluous to add that all of the women mentioned are suffragists.—N. Y. Herald.

MRS. HETTY'S CHEST.

The tradition of treasures buried by the pirates of Kidd Lafitte and Blackbeard gave a romantic interest to the Altantic coast from Massachusetts to Georgia. Thousands of men have searched for these buried chests of gold but there is authentic record of only two "finds," one on the New England coast, the other in Virginia, says the "Cincinnati Commercial Gazette." The latter is said to have furnished Poe with the foundation of his story of the "gold bug." The facts are briefly these:

In the Atlantic ocean, lying off the Virginia coast, there are two or three heavily wooded islands. One of these was the resort of Blackbeard, and was called by his name—Teach. A neighoring island a century ago belonged to a wealthy woman on the mainland. It was a wilderness which never had been inhabited except by foxes, wild ducks and other game. A trusty old slave named Ben was placed by her in a cabin on the beach to bring her occasionally game and fish.

One day while walking on the shore Ben saw a yellow gleam in the sand. It came from a gold coin. He searched breathlessly along the beach and found a rusty iron box, one end of which had fallen out. Within was a heap of coins, with crosses and silver crucifixes. The old man went to his cabin and brought an empty salt bag, which he filled with the coins. He then dragged a heap of brush over the chest to conceal it, set up a broken sappling to mark the place, and started for the mainland to give the treasure to his mistress.

Tradition says that Mrs. Hetty was a hard, suspicious woman, and that when the trusty old negro gave her the mass of coin her joy was equaled by her terror that he would rob her of the great treasure which he had left behind. A heavy storm raged for five days. It was impossible for her to make the voyage to the island in an open boat, and she would not trust Ben, nor even her brother or son to go with her. At the end of a week the sea was calm enough for her to cross, but the sapling, the brush and the chest had disappeared. An unbroken stretch of sand covered the whole coast.

Ben could not find the spot then nor ever after. His mistress, it is said, kept him at the search as long as he lived, aiding him herself, but in vain. Some of the gunners who have visited the island have also searched for Mrs. Hetty's chest, but it has never been found. Nothing is certain but the fact that the bag of coins was brought to her and that the touch of the gold and her suspicions and greed made her life wretched to the end. The poor fishermen of the coast understand the moral of her story. When any of their number grows avaricious they say that he has "rubbed his hands against Hetty's iron chest."

CHICAGO'S RICH MEN.

At a public dinner given in this city two years ago a number of our wealthiest citizens were present, and other guests fell to discussing the probable fortunes of these individuals. The discussion was pursued with exceptional intelligence, for the reason that the participants therein were in a way to know somewhat of what they were talking about. It was conceded that Marshall Field was the richest man in Chicago; the lowest estimate put his wealth at $30,000,000. There was a remarkable unanimity of opinion as to the wealth of Pullman and Armour —$15,000,000 and $10,000,000 respectively. At the same time it was said that there were four or five other Chicagoans, by no means so well known as these whom we have named, whose riches individually would probably exceed those of Pullman. That is to say, in the list of Chicago millionaires, with Marshall Field at the head, Pullman would be in sixth place, and between him and Phil Armour two or three other names would probably occur.—Chicago Record.

CHOOSING A CAREER.

The Greatest Opportunities for a Successful Career.

PROGRESS MADE IN CHEMISTRY.

Watch Your Opportunities—Places do not Come at Once—They are Sometimes Hard to Obtain.

There are times in a young man's life when he is beset as to what he shall do for a livelihood, and the question as to a choice between a profession and a technical course is before him. In looking over an experience of nearly fifteen years, it seems as if, notwithstanding the many disappointments in life, there is a greater oportunity for a young man in the field of technology than anywhere else.

If the question were to be put as to what branch of technology offered the greatest opportunities for a successful career, the answer would be, in the domain of technical chemistry. The world is full of men who cannot make a success in any career, and yet they get along somehow. But they are not the ones to whom one should look as examples. Rather study the careers of those who have succeeded and who have overcome the obstacles that have at times impeded their progress. The success of Carnegie in this country and the success of Bessemer in England are well known illustrations of men who have succeeded, but for fear some captious individual may say, "Yes, but that was when times were different," let us take a modern example, one of the immediate present. No one in recent years has so thoroughly made a high reputation for himself as a chemist as H. Y. Castner. Let us examine his career for a short while, and see if there is not something in it that may encourage the young man about to enter upon a technical career. Castner left the School of Mines in 1879 without a degree, and at once devoted himself to the practice of analytical chemistry. An analyst has, unfortunately, but few opportunities of developing his abilities. He does one thing, and the one thing that dozens of men can do, and do equally well. There is no future to that sort of work. This Castner promptly recognized and devoted his leisure to the study of chemical processes. It was not long before he became interested in the manufacture of boneblack, and soon invented a continuous process for making that article. It was a chemical success, but, for reasons that had to do with the economic conditions of the market, it failed to be a pecuniary success. The cheap production of aluminum was then a subject of considerable study on the part of chemists both here and in Europe. Castner examined the ground very carefully, making a very complete study of the literature of the subject, and then set to work experimenting. He soon invented a process concerning which Sir Frederick Nobel, in his presidential address before the British Association in 1890, said that it constituted "one of the most interesting of recent illustrations of the progress made in technical chemistry, consequent upon the happy blending of chemical with mechanical science through the labors of the chemical engineer." A unique success was made, and the world heralded the new discovery with applause, but soon electrolytic processes compelled the abandonemnt of the direct chemical production of aluminum. The characteristic feature of the Castner process was its method of making sodium, and he promptly turned his attention to that element, creating a demand for it which he supplied. He also called attention to the value of sodium peroxide, which was promptly recognized, and his plant at Oldbury continued in active operation, furnishing at a profit many of the sodium salts. Here we have a career of a chemist who is not yet forty years of age, but who has invented three valuable improvements in exsting processes. These inventions, each of which has marked a distinct era in the progress of science, have gained for the inventor a handsome fortune.

More recently Castner has invented an electrolytic process for the decomposition of alkaline chlorides, yielding caustic soda and chlorine, which, according to certain English technical journals, may result in revolutionizing the long-accepted Le Blanc and Solvay processes.

It is not necessary to enter upon any discussion of the merit of these inventions. They are cited simply for the purpose of illustrating that opportunities exist around us all the time, which, if properly seized upon, lead us to fortune and reputation.

In no country in the world are the possibilities of a successful career in the line of technical chemistry more evident than in these United States. With the single exception of potassium salts, there is no limit almost to the amount of crude substances existing in nature, capable and ready for use. One single illustration of this fact may be permitted. Candles made from the paraffine contained in ozokerite are considered superior to all others. If the deposits of this mineral that exist in Utah were developed and used for the making of candles, the entire supply required for the region that exists between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean would be at the mercy of the maker. And yet we import candles.

The magnificent soap establishments in Chicago and Cincinnati are striking examples of the growth of enormous plants from very small beginnings. It is for such work that the chemist must educate himself. First he needs an education at some technical school, and there are many of these. In New York City there is the School of Mines of Columbia College; in Boston there is the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; in Chicago there is the Armour Institute; in Golden there is the Colorado School of Mines and near San Francisco there are the technical departments of the University of California. In any one of these, and they are all good, a young man may prepare himself for just such a career as Castner has made for himself. He must devote himself to the study of principles. These will be of more value than skill in manipulation or a special knowledge of details. It is a great deal better to know how to make any analysis than to be able to make any one single analysis without error.

It is a great deal better to know how to install any factory than to be able to put up one kind of works. With this general idea the student pursues his course until graduation. Places do not come at once, and even sometimes are hard to obtain, but in time the way will open, and then, if the fledgling is able to put into practice the knowledge that he has acquired, there are no hieghts in the professional world to which he may not soar. Watch your opportunities. If you study the career of any great man, you will find that it was the opportunity that made him. Grant might have remained a tanner in Galena if his opportunity had not come to him with the civil war. If opportunities do not come readily, you must try and force them. No process is perfect so long as it is of human origin. Therefore, select a process, study it, find out its weak point, and endeavor to improve that. In this way your opportunity will come. Find uses for refuse materials. Remember that the refuse of gas works became the source of the aniline colors. Frequently the value of by-products is sufficient to pay for the porcess. Thus the precious metals obtained in the electrolytic refining of copper enable the smelters of Montana and Arizona to sell refined copper at a price far below that which English smelters can afford. Inspiration and suggestions frequently come from sources that are seldom expected. A poet was once speaking of his valuable reference library. The connection was at first blush not apparent, but it soon transpired that in his descriptions of nature he always verified his fancies by reference to his books. The reason of his having gained the reputation of being a poet true to nature was thus disclosed. His appreciation of a value or an application in something apparently remote from his work showed his genius. So it is in chemistry. The man who is successful will find suggestions when he least expects them, and which, if properly applied, will bring him wealth or that which is better, a high reputation.—Scientific American.

THE DESTITUTION IN NEBRASKA.

Unless the crop of 1895 is a remarkaby bountiful one, a considerable share of the counties of western Nebraska will be nearly depopulated by next fall. As it is, two successive crop failures have sent thousands of families in search of more promising land and reduced thousands more to the verge of starvation. In twelve or fourteen of the southwestern counties utter destitution exists, and unless generous supplies of food and fuel are promptly sent and systematically distributed, the most squalid of deaths will be the fate of many. There are hundreds of houses where the provision supplies do not exceed, all told, a pound a head. Scurvy, from insufficient food and the lack of vegetables, has made its appearance in some quarters, and physicians predict an epidemic of the disease unless a food remedy is quickly supplied. While the grazing is good, and some money is made by a few persons caring for herds of horses sent there for the winter from the eastern part of the State, feed will be needed in the early spring in order to put horses intended for field-work into condition for that labor.

While a considerable number of cattle are to be found in this part of Nebraska, there is hardly one hoof in twenty which is not mortgaged, thereby preventing the putative owner from realizing either in money or in beef for his family's sustenance. The ownership of a considerable herd therefore does not argue an ability to keep starvation from the door. But the stock has largely gone out of the country. Every owner of cows or steers who could get away has moved out, and those who were not so fortunate have sold their cattle one by one during the summer at ruinous prices, or, worse yet, are not able to sell or kill on account of mortgages. This whole country—plains, plateaus, and sand hills—was once and is yet a great grazing-ground. Hundreds of thousands, yes, millions, of head of cattle gained flesh on this splendid grass, which covers the ground with a carpet, gray in summer and brown in winter. The great cattle companies, those gigantic stock combinations which we now hear of in Wyoming and Montana, once let their enormous herds roam over this section with litle expense save herding. But the westward tide of farm immigration, enticed by the allurements of cheap land, soon drove the cattle to the west and north. The lands became more valuable for farm purposes than for grazing, and the herds finally fell back upon the Wyoming table-lands and foothills.—Harper's Weekly.

GRIZZLY BEARS.

John Houston's Terrific Encounters with Them.

HE HAS SLAIN OVER 200 OF THEM.

A Brief Account of Some of His Hairbreadth Encounters—Hunting Up British Columbia.

John Houston, who is spending the winter in Southern California, is known up and down the Pacific Coast because of his experience in bear hunting in the Rocky Mountains and the Sierras. He has slain over 200 black, cinnamon and grizzly bears in the last twenty years, and his scarred face, his lacerated hands and the great wounds on his arms and chest bear evidence of some terrific encounters he has had with the bear family in his wild mountain life.

"I used to think," said he, while a circle of deeply interestd hearers stood about him the other evening, "that there was nothing in the shape of a wild bear that could equal the grizzly bears of the mountains in Northern California and Oregon, and I stuck to it that for size and ugliness none of that tribe anywhere could beat them. Since I have been hunting up in British Columbia I have changed my mind. You wouldn't believe it, but the grizzlies in the canyons and mountain forests away up there are simply mammoth by the side of the members of the same family in the States. I have never killed or seen a grizzly in the States that weighed over 1,100 or 1,200 pounds and measured 8 feet from the nose to the tip of the tail. The majority of the beasts weigh 900 or 1,000 pounds, and their length from tip to tip is about 7 feet 3 inches.

"In British Columbia and even in Manitoba there are any quantity of these great, hulking critters that weigh 1400 pounds and I have seen some that tipped the beam at 1,600 pounds when ready to cut up. The bears up there frequently measure 8 feet 2 inches from the nozzle to the tip of the tail, and I have measured several carcasses that were a little over 9 feet in full length.

"I don't know how to account for such a difference in size between members of the same family of beasts in this country and across the line in Queen Vic's realm, but it's so. You may imagine the overpowering feelings of a man who, alone in canyon or in some forest, miles away from any human being, suddenly sees advancing upon him a great grizzly bear, standing at full length on his haunches, some nine or ten feet high, with forepaws extended, mouth open and eyes flashing anger and rage, while powerful roars issue from its throat. You may have some idea that it takes the coolest nerves and the steadiest aim for a man to stand his ground and wait for such a monster to advance so near to him as to present the best possible mark for a ball that shall be fatal. Errors of aim or judgment at such a time must not be allowed for. It must be instant death to the advancing grizzly, or a probable death a few seconds later to the hunter. But it is just such excitement, such hazardous and wild sport that keeps me hunting for months every year, when I could have comfort and plenty by living in a town or city.

"How many grizzlies do I think there are in British Columbia? Why, there must be thousands of them in British Columbia and Manitoba together. For over twenty years the number of black and grizzly bears slain annually has been reported at Victoria and Vancouver to be from 800 to 1000. Twenty years ago there were ten times as many bears, and in one season the Hudson Bay Company bought at Winnipeg and at Victoria over 4,000 bear skins for less than $2 each. But the grizzlies are going the same way that the buffalo has gone and the moose is fast going. I doubt if the beasts will ever really become extinct, for they are hard to trap, and live in places difficult of access and remote from human habitation. The best grizzly and black bear skins now easily bring $18 among the fur buyers in British Columbia. I can remember when the same pelts could have been bought by the wagonload for $1 or $2 each. That was when fur rugs were not fashionable, and there were tens of thousands of buffalo to furnish skins for winter robes.

"The most memorable experience I ever had in following a grizzly was in the summer of 1875, when I was new at bear hunting. I was with a half-breed Sioux Indian in a sparsely timbered region north of Dakota in the Manitoba country. We were among heavy brush one morning when we suddenly came upon the largest grizzly, indeed the largest bear, I had ever seen. My Indian companion was about 30 years of age, a perfect type of a muscular and sinewy hunter. He did not know what fear was, and was cool and unmoved in the presence of a maddened grizzly. At the same time he had the caution of all good half-breed hunters, in attacking a grizzly, and at once looked for every point of vantage in the surroundings, in case we should be compelled to come to close quarters. Our appearance in the opening had been a surprise to the bear, which was engaged in tearing a hollow log to pieces with its great front claws in search of squirrels.

"After recovering from its first surprise the bear rose on its hind feet and relieved itself of a few roars that were not reassuring for our comfort. It threw its forepaws straight above its head and for an instant stood as if about to charge upon us. It probably had such intention, but as it stood erect a vulnerable and vital part exposed—of which parts there are few on a grizzly bear—my Indian companion took cool aim and sent a ball into the animal's vitals. It gave two or three powerful blows with its forepaws on the wounded part, accompanying them with its well-known roar or howl and fell dead without moving out of its tracks.

"The bear had hardly reached the ground—the Indian's rifle being still raised in readiness to pour a second charge into the animal's body if the first had not proved sufficient—when there came a loud crash in the brush to our right, and before either of us was prepared for what followed I saw my half-breed guide raised clear from his feet and hurled through the air for three or four yards, falling in a heap on the ground near the bear he had killed. A second grizzly had heard the cries of the one the Indian had shot and had come dashing to the spot. It had not waited to look into the cause of the trouble, but had taken a hand in it at once by an attack on my companion. The Indian did not need any further intimation to know what he had on hand, and he was on his feet again with amazing quickness. The blow from the bear's paw had torn the flesh from his left cheek and side of his head, and it hung in strips down on his neck. The Indian's gun had been forced from his hand. The blood poured from his head and face in streams. He quickly drew his short-handed hunting ax, which was in his belt, and awaited the charge of the bear, which was nearly as big as the one that lay dead on the ground.

"The second charge of the bear was so terrible that it must have borne down half a dozen men, and consequently my muscular companion was no more than as a reed before it. He went down and the grizzly stood over him and growled as if enjoying the hunter's peril, and rejoicing over the fate that awaited him.

"These incidents had all occurred with such rapidity that I had not time to think, let alone act, but when I saw the Indian lying at the mercy of the great brute that would crush him to death at the next blow of his paw I knew that his life depended on my course. I sprung forward and, placing the muzzle of my rifle almost at the bear's right ear, as he stood gloating over his victim, pulled both triggers.

"No more effective shot was ever fired. The heavy bullets plowed through the grizzly's brain and forced the top of his great head off like the lid of a kettle. The huge brute, although he must have died, almost instantly actually remained standing for at least a minute as he had stood when I fired.

"At last he fell over by the side of the Indian, with the foreleg thrown across the hunter's breast.

"The Indian was unconscious, and remained so for several minutes. His left side had been crushed by the bears' second charge, and the poor fellow was bruised and torn shockingly in other places. I got him safely to our quarters, and it was a month before he got around again. He was terribly disfigured, the one side of his face being one ghastly scar, but he recovered his former strength, and the last I heard of him he was still hunting grizzlies, and many had fallen under his deadly aim since his close call in the poplar woods when my timely shot saved his life.

"While I believe that in a majority of cases a grizzly bear will wait for a fight with a man, and take pains to get in the way of one, there are times when it will seem to back out. A remarkable instance of this kind I heard of once, where a famous Oregon guide courageously advanced upon three grizzlies, an old she bear and two half-grown young bears, and by a series of ridiculous monkey-shines and acrobatic maneuvers on the ground within a rod or two of the animals filled them with such astonishment and fear that the three retreated into the woods with all rapidity. The guide's gun had snapped in both barrels, he having drawn on the old bear before the young ones appeared. He afterward said that it was in a fit of desperation that he tried the turning of a handspring and jumping up and down, flopping his hands and resorting to other unhunter-like measures. He had been told once that a hunter had frightened away a mountain lion by similar absurd movements, and he found that it worked to perfection in the case of the bears, although he did not encourage any one to go hunting grizzlies armed with nothing more than a capacity to turn somersaults.

"When there were buffalo on the plains the British Columbia grizzlies were great hunters of them. When a grizzly and buffalo met there was always sure to be a contest, but it seldom lasted long, and the buffalo was usually the victim. The buffalo would charge upon the bear, which awaited the onset of his foe erect on his haunches. As the buffalo dashed upon him the bear threw himself aside, and with a blow as quick as lightning with one of his forepaws seldom failed to break his antagonist's neck. A grizzly bear has been known to engage in quick succession four and even five big buffalo bulls and to kill every one of them. It frequently happened, however, that some younger and more active bull than his companions succeeded in evading the fatal blow of the grizzly's terrible forepaw long enough to give in turn a fatal thrust with his horn in the bear's side, piercing the vitals and making of the contest a mutual slaughter."—Chicago Record.

LINCOLN AND GRANT.

Opposition to the Grade of Lieutenant-General.

GRANT LIONIZED IN WASHINGTON.

Dissatisfaction with Halleck was the Only Thing that Made Passible the Higher Title.

Mr. Noah Brooks was one of the best-known newspaper men in Washington during the war times, and he was admitted to unusual intimacy with Lincoln. Mr. Brooks has been contributing a series of personal recollections of Lincoln and of the members of his cabinet to the "Century." In the February number of the magazine he says:

It is interesting to call to mind some of the forces which made Grant the general-in-chief of the armies of the United States, and some of the incidents that attended the consummation of that historic work. It was by no means a grateful task for the Congressmen of that time to lend a hand in creating the grade of lieutenant-general in the army, although there was no question as to the man on whom that distinction should be conferred. I question very much if the bill to revive the grade of lieutenant-general would have gone through Congress then if it had not been for the very general dissatisfaction with Gen. Halleck, who was acting as general-in-chief with headquarters at Washington. This dissatisfaction was constantly increasing, and, although the country at large did not seem to be very keenly alive to Halleck's inadequacy to the situation, Washington, and especially the chambers of Congress, resounded with complaints of his sluggishness, his unwillingness to take responsibilities, and his supposed incapacity to grasp the whole military situation. I doubt if the most ontspoken and malignant Copper-head in Congress was so disliked, so railed against, and so reviled by the more radilal members as this unfortunate general-in-chief.

The belief that some new man, no matter who he might be, could vigorously prosecute the war and bring a speedy peace if he were in Halleck's place, made possible the passage of the bill reviving the rank of lieutenant-general of the army. Oddly enough, men who complained that the President clung tenaciously to Gen. Halleck as his military adviser, never doubted for a moment that Mr. Lincoln was more than willing that the rank should be revived with the distinct understanding that Grant should be the wearer of the title, and by virtue thereof become at once the generalissimo of all the military forces of the United States.

That the President did cling to Halleck, in spite of the very general popular disfavor with which the general was regarded, is well known. When I ventured, one day, to say to the President that Halleck was disliked because many people supposed that he was too timid and hesitating in his military conduct, Mr. Lincoln's face at once wore a sober, almost severe, expression as he said that he was Halleck's friend because nobody else was.

Other men had received from the President a somewhat similar impression; and, whatever may have been thought of the very remote possibility that any other man than Gen. Grant would be called to the head of the armies, Congressmen who were clamorous for a more vigorous prosecution of the war were eagerly turning to the "lieutenant-general bill," as it was called, as the readiest way to be rid of Gen. Halleck's alleged slowness.

If there was any doubt as to the popularity of Grant in Washington (and he was disposed to regard that city as a place of snares), the arrival of the newly-created lieutenant-general effectually dissipated it. He had been called to the capital, and had arrived there late in the afternoon of March 8, 1864.

That evening as it chanced, was the occasion of the usual weekly reception at the White House, and thither Gen. Grant went by special invitation. Thither too went throngs of people when it was known that he would be on view with the President. So great was the crowd, and so wild the rush to get near the general, that he was obliged at last to mount a sofa where he could be seen, and where he was secure, at least for a time, from the madness of the multitude. Women were caught up and whirled in the torrent which swept through the great East Room. Ladies suffered dire disaster in the crush and confusion; their laces were torn and cirnolines mashed; and people got upon sofas, chairs, and tables to be out of harm's way or to get a better view of the spectacle.

It was the only real mob I ever saw in the White House. It was an indescribable scene of curiosity, joy, and pleasure. For once at least the President of the United States was not the chief figure in the picture. The little, scared-looking man who stood on a crimson-covered sofa was the idol of the hour. He remained on view for a short time; then he was quietly smuggled out by friendly hands, and next day he departed from the city, which he then appeared to dread so much, to begin the last and mightiest chapter in his military career.

The Butte, Montana, District Court recently rendered a dicision which, if sustained, will have unwholesome effect. The owner of a mine made a contract by which the party contracted was to operate his mine for a certain time, and make certain improvements with the privilege of buying it, a stated proportion of the proceeds of the ore to be paid to the owner, which would be credited on the price in case the mine was bought. If not, all the payments and improvements were to be forfeited. The contractor made improvements on the mine for which he did not pay, failed to buy the mine and turned it over to the owner with all the improvements. The court held that he was the agent of the owner, under contract to operate the mine, and that it was subject to a lien for supplies and materials furnished at his request. If this holds good, many a mine owner will fear to bond or lease his mine with working priveleges, lest he be run into debt against his will or beyond his financial ability.

It is true that the Fifty-third Congress did not accomplish all that was hoped for when it was elected, but it has done something for which it will be held in grateful remembrance by the American people. It repealed the Federal election law, under which the party in power could ride over the people's rights to choose their public servants, and it repealed the infamous McKinley law, under which the necessities of the people were made the prey of the combined and and allied trusts and monopolies. Laws of the character of these two will never be enacted again in this country, and for that the people will be under lasting obligations to the Democrats of the Fifty-third Congress. For the sins of omission of this Congaess the Democrats are not alone to blame. The laws that should have been enacted and were not, are not partizan measures and were advocated and opposed by members from both sides of Congress.

The most vicious legislation of this session was the passage of the anti-scalpers bill. It was an insult to those who travel by rail and a robbery of the meanest character. The act is really special legislation, declaring that when a citizen has dealings with the Southern Pacific Raiload corporation he shall be compelled to respect their rights rather than his own. The law regulating the sale of railroad tickets provides that the contract is nullified if the ticket is sold by the original purchaser before the contract has been fulfilled. The absurdity of such a law must be apparent even to the railroad people themselves, for they do not ask the Legislature to prohibit the transfer of other property—stolen land for instance—after the purchaser has paid the railroad prices. The Governor has vetoed the bill.

The feminine lobby at Sacramento tried to steal a march on the old guard yesterday. They came within six votes of compelling the Senate to redeem the Republican pledge to give women the right (or privilege) of suffrage. They did succeed in getting a concurrent resolution through submitting the question to the people in the form of a constitutional amendment at the next election. If this amendment should be adopted, the Republicans will probably have the nerve to claim that their pledge was redeemed, but the women will have sense enough to believe otherwise, unless the average intelligence of the woman voter is inferior to that of the legislators who killed the original bill.

The San Jose Mercury, a leading Republican paper, passes its opinion on the Republican Legislature by saying that if Governor Budd keeps his promises of retrenchment in the State's expenses he will veto more bills than he approves. The Republican party in the State is come to a pretty pass when it has to rely on a Democratic Governor to prevent the Republican Legislature from bankrupting the treasury.

The report of the investigatiug committee that either Dunn is a liar or Biggy didn't tell the truth, is an absolutely correct conclusion, but the public knew it before.

THE KING OF INNISHKEA.

He Dwells on an Irish Island and Rules a Mayo Tribe.

About 16 miles from Dugort, in Achill island, out to sea, looking like a thin line of sand in the waves of the Atlantic, is the island of Innishkea. One fine morning our party started to visit it in a trusty hooker. As the hooker came in sight of the shore great excitement was visible among the islanders, and it was very hard to realize that we were still but 36 hours' journey from London.

The inhabitants turned out en masse. The women and children in their scanty garments of red flannel crouched outside their cabins, while numbers of the men ran down to the beach and put out in their coracles on chance of rowing us to land. It was a strange scene and curiously like a picture plate in a boy's book of adventures. We knew there was a king of Innishkea, and soon a tall, bronze faced man was pointed out to us as his majesty. On landing all the party were introduced and conducted by him to the palace, where the queen dowager, with her daughter, bade us welcome in true Irish fashion.

The old lady was in her picturesque native costume—red dress and plaid shawl over her head. The princess, however, had evidently on first sight of the hooker arrayed herself in modern fashion to do us honor, and we were amused on penetrating into the reception room to find advertisements from shops in Buckingham Palace road and St. Paul's churchyard hung up to embellish the wall, though only by a favored few could they be read.

The island was destitute of any school or means of instruction for the children, a very small proportion either understood or spoke English, and there was neither watch nor clock among the people, who had a happy go lucky idea of time and troubled themselves little as to Greenwich regulations.

There were no church bells to ring, no trains to catch, no office hours requiring punctuality, so when the sun was high in the heavens they would get through their not arduous farming duties, and when he sank in the great waste of waters they could sleep. The king's word settled all disputes. It was a hereditary monarchy, and his people, so far as he was concerned, were untaxed. Happy those states, thought some of the visitors, where royalty could be maintained with so little grandeur! However, I am in honesty bound to add we found King Philip had other means of filling his coffers besides levying taxes on his faithful subjects and learned the art of making good his opportunity whenever the Saxon stranger ventured to land on his shore. But Innishkea has an interest altogether apart from its situation, surrounded as it is by lovely views of mountain cliff and rocky headland. On this spot, hundreds of years ago, early Christian missionaries landed, and on top of a shelly mount, half a mile from the beach, are Christian remains of great antiquity. West of the island there stand also the ruins of a church said to have been built by the successors of St. Columba.—Leisure Hours.

Jenny Lind.

Jenny Lind must have been the most simple, unpretending prima donna that ever lived. When she first came to England she was bound to sing only at the Royal Italian Opera House, and when commanded to sing at the queen's concert she was obliged to refuse. Very sorry to be compelled to notify this, she ordered her carriage and drove straight to Buckingham palace. She handed her card to an official, who, not unnaturally, declined to take it in. A higher authority happened to pass and took it upon himself to present it. As soon as her majesty saw it she said, "Admit her, by all means." Jenny Lind appeared and said simply that she was so very sorry to be unable to sing at her majesty's concert that she thought it better to call herself and explain. The queen was charmed with her natural manner, gave her a cordial reception and promised to be her friend.—Today.

A Fine Polish For Tinware.

When the kitchen range is cleaned out, there will be found in the flue under the oven a considerable quantity of gray dust. It is not ashes exactly, not yet soot, but a smoke deposit as near akin to lampblack as a coal fire is able to produce—soft, light, impalpable, finer than the finest flour. Not many among those who throw this into the ash bin are probably aware that this is the best thing in the world for polishing tinware, far surpassing all the prepared powders and pastes sold for that purpose. Apply it to the tin with a damp cloth, and a few strokes will produce such a luster as is on new ware or as the engraver puts upon his zinc plates by the use of charcoal.—Exchange.

Triumph of Bad Spelling.

Mr. R. E. Bartlett, Chelmsford, writes: "I can beat the achievement of Charles Edward, who, by spelling box 'botsk,' made more mistakes than the letters admit of. I have in my possession a letter addressed many years ago to my father, in which 13 mistakes are made in a single word of five letters. The word is, or was meant to be, usage; the spelling is yowzitch. There are thus five sins of omission and eight of commission; total, 13."—London News.

Pretty Thin.

They have recently made gold leaf by electro-chemical processes as thin as four-millionths of an inch thick, if you can imagine that. It was exactly 1-2,798,000 of an inch. The highest previous thinness ever reached was 1-267,650. This is 10,584 times thinner than ordinary thin writing paper.—Journal of Education.

Unconscious Candor.

"Some women can't believe a word their husbands say," she remarked.

"Well," confided the other, "I'm not quite so badly off as that. My husband talks in his sleep occasionally."—Washington Star.

Obituary.

John Wilson died at his home at Lone Pine last Saturday morning at 4 o'clock. Mr. Wilson was a Supervisor of Inyo County, representing the Fourth District, and when the news of his death reached Independence, the Court House flag was placed at half mast in respect to his memory. Jack Wilson came to Inyo County in the 60's and ever since has been identified with its mining interests. He owned a number of mining properties during his lifetime. In character he was a whole-souled man; generous to a fault and a staunch and determined friend. He was at all times ready to sacrifice himself if a friend could be benefited. The keynote of his character was his absolute unselfishness and devotion to his friends. For a number of years he has been a sufferer from Brights disease and in November last met with an accident which aggravated his malady, being thrown from a buggy by a runaway team. About the first of January he went to the German Hospital at San Francisco for treatment. He remained there about a month and Hon. P. Reddy had him removed to the Baldwin Hotel and placed under the care of Dr. Regensburger. In early days Mr. Reddy and he had been firm friends and the former did everything in his power to alleviate the sufferings of the deceased. Realizing that his end was near he returned home to die. His wife and adopted daughter were his only relatives, but a host of friends paid their respect to his remains and will hold him in kindly remembrance.

In the Superior Court.

The case of the people vs A. J. Murphy charged with selling whiskey to Indians was called Tuesday. P. H. Mack Esq appearing for the defendant. A jury consisting of W. H. Uhlmeyer, Wm. Jenkins, Thos. Kehoe, F. G. Burkhardt, Ira W. Brown, Chas. Houle, Henry Bell, David Vaughn, James Conners, Benigno Aguirre, J. C. Miller, John Keegan, was secured and the evidence was all in by noon of Wednesday. When Court reconvened Wednesday afternoon the jury was dismissed.

The case of the people vs Fon Len Yung was then called. B. H. Yandell Esq. appeared as counsel for the defendant having been so appointed by the Court. A jury was secured consisting of: Wm. Jenkins, Louis Wood, F. G. Burkhardt, Chas. Houle Sam G. McMurry, Jacob C. Miller, P. S. Partridge, B. Aguirre, Jacob Frager, S. R. Powers, Henry Bell, D. Vaughn. The defendant was found guilty, and this morning was brought before Judge Arnot and sentenced to two years in Folsom prison.

To whom It May Concern.

Notice is hereby given that I will not be responsible for any debts contracted by my son Albert Aguirre, a minor. And all parties are notified not to give him credit on my account.

BENIGNO AGUIRRE

In Baking Powders "Royal" Leads.

As the result of my tests, I find the ROYAL BAKING POWDER superior to all the others in every respect. It is entirely free from all adulteration and unwholesome impurity, and in baking it gives off a greater volume of leavening gas than any other powder. It is therefore not only the purest, but also the strongest powder with which I am acquainted.

BOY'S FUN IN THE ARTICS.

The oldest boys of an Eskimo village have all sorts of hunting games—musk-ox hunts, polar-bear hunts, and many other of like character, which, I fear, would take up too much time to describe here. In this way they fit themselves to become expert hunters by the time they become young men. In athletic sports these boys really excel, and a roll down hill is for them the greatest fun. They generally find a very steep hill, well covered with snow, and seat themselves on the ridge, thrust their heads between their legs, pass their hand over their ankles, presing their legs as closely against their bodies as possible. Thus they really become great balls covered with reindeer hair. And then away they go on the down-hill race, suddenly spreading themselves out at full length at the bottom of the hill. An amusement that requires a great deal of muscular strength is a peculiar kind of short race on the hands and feet, the legs and arms held perfectly rigid. It is quite exhausting, and they generally cover but two or three yards at a time. They have many similar ways of racing to toughen the muscles of both legs and feet.—Sunday School Times.

BRANDING A CLAIM FALSE.

World's Fair Officials Expose a Pretender to an Award.

A most discreditable result of the late Chicago World's Fair is the fraudulent advertising of awards never received, by a Chicago baking powder firm. Officials of the Exposition are much incensed, and have notified the offending parties that the misstatements must cease. They are defied, however, by the Chicago concern, who continue to advertise the false statement that they received the highest award for strength, purity and excellence. Mr. Thatcher, Chief of Agricultural Awards, shows in his letter that the awards granted were "for an exhibit of baking powder," merely, not for superiority; while the Judge of Awards on Baking Powders writes a letter saying that "no such award was given to the Chicago company," as the company claims and advertises.

Another fact in conection with the baking powder business at the Chicago Fair has come to light. The identical baking powder made by the Chicago concern, and so brazenly advertised as having received the highest award for purity and excellence, it now appears was found by the analysts who made the tests at the Fair to contain traces of ammonia and sulphates.

The officials believe that though they may be powerless to stop the misleading publications of which they complain, the quick wit of the people will doubtless detect the spurious claims and be able to apply the proper remedy.

THE ONWARD MARCH

of Consumption is stopped short by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. If you haven't waited beyond reason, there's complete recovery and cure.

Although by many believed to be incurable, there is the evidence of hundreds of living witnesses to the fact that, in all its earlier stages, consumption is a curable disease. Not every case, but a large percentage of cases, and we believe, fully 98 per cent. are cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, even after the disease has progressed so far as to induce repeated bleedings from the lungs, severe lingering cough with copious expectoration (including tubercular matter), great loss of flesh and extreme emaciation and weakness.

Do you doubt that hundreds of such cases reported to us as cured by "Golden Medical Discovery" were genuine cases of that dread and fatal disease? You need not take our word for it. They have, in nearly every instance, been so pronounced by the best and most experienced home physicians, who have no interest whatever in misrepresenting them, and who were often strongly prejudiced and advised against a trial of "Golden Medical Discovery," but who have been forced to confess that it surpasses, in curative power over this fatal malady, all other medicines with which they are acquainted. Nasty cod-liver oil and its filthy "emulsions" and mixtures, had been tried in nearly all these cases and had either utterly failed to benefit, or had only seemed to benefit a little for a short time. Extract of malt, whiskey, and various preparations of the hypophosphites had also been faithfully tried in vain.

The photographs of a large number of those cured of consumption, bronchitis, lingering coughs, asthma, chronic nasal catarrh and kindred maladies, have been skillfully reproduced in a book of 160 pages which will be mailed to you, on receipt of address and six cents in stamps. You can then write those cured and learn their experience. Address WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, Buffalo, N. Y.

The Claim on Deer Creek.

By A. H. GIBSON.

"Yer right, Nancy; an' we'll make a reg'lar home of it ef it is only a ole dug-out."

Ned Dugan rode home, leaving the new settlers alone.

They had just finished their evening meal, and had started to remove some of their goods from the wagon into the dug-out, when a man rode up and shouted in a loud, harsh voice:

"Hello!"

The bright light of their camp fire showed Hamlet and Nancy a man of about thirty, with a hard, cadaverous countenance, pale gray eyes and red, bristly hair and mustache. He was roughly dressed, and wore a broad belt, from which protruded a pair of large revolvers and a huge knife.

It was plain that he was a desperate character, and as his small, evil eyes fell on the girl's fair face and pretty form she shrank out of his sight into the shadow of the covered wagon.

"What yer doin' hyer?" he demanded of Hamlet, who faced him unflinchingly.

"I'm 'tendin' to my own business, thet's what!"

"Look hyer, do yer know wot claim jumpers gits out on these puraries?"

"I reckon they git the claim."

"Don't try ter rub any o' yer durned smartness off on me. Answer me straight!"

"All right. Ask questions as ef yer was addressin' a gentleman an' I will."

"How'd yer git hyer?"

"In thet covered wagon."

"Wall, yer'll go erway in it again sooner'n yer 'lowed to, I reckon, or Dick Hines is a blamed liar!"

"Hines or any other chap's a liar who says I'm goin' off o' this claim. I traded fur it, fair an' squar', an' I'm hyer to stay!"

"Traded fur it! How?"

"I traded Ik Pender cattle fur it, back in Illinoy. Thet's how I got it."

"Waal, yer deceived, stranger, thet's all. I'm sorry fur yer, but it kain't be holped. My claim's erhead o' yer'n. Yer see Ik owed me fur a span o' mules wot he got of me, and when he left the country without payin' fur 'em I took this claim o' his hyer on Deer creek."

"I kain't help thet, Mr. Hines. I'm not responsible fur Ik Pender's debts, an' ther claim's mine, an' hyer I'm goin' ter stick."

"I've been 'bidin' in thet dugout off an' on now fur two months, and I tell yer ther claim's mine!" asserted Dick Hines, with an oath that made Nancy shudder.

"Yers by jumpin', I reckon. But thet's no right, ef a man does owe yer. Besides thar's nothin' in the dugout ter prove yer've been stayin' hyer except a few prairie chicken feathers an' rabbit skins, an' sich dirt maybe. The neighbors shorely didn't know o' yer 'bidin' hyer on Pender's claim, from what they've been sayin' ter me. I guess yer've been keepin' yer claim jumpin' mighty secret, hain't yer? Maybe yer afeared o' ther league, fur I hyar it said over ter Dugan's thet ther settlers air pledged ter pertect a fellar's claim durin' his absence. Like as not yer've been dreamin' ther claim's yer'n. Ride home, stranger, an' come round in ther mornin' an' tell us yer made a mistake."

With a horrible oath Hines snatched one of the revolvers from his belt, and pointed it toward Adam Hamlet's heart. "D—n yer! I'll leave yer hyer fur ther coyotes ter pick," and his fingers touched the trigger.

With a scream that echoed wildly across the prairie, Nancy threw herself before her father.

CHAPTER II.

Nancy had flung her strong young arms around her father's neck.

But Dick Hines did not shoot. Either he was too cowardly or he had a large enough spark of manhood within him not to fire at a woman.

Nancy had flung her strong young arms around her father's neck, and placed herself a loving screen between him and danger.

There she stood in the little camp fire's ruddy light before that isolated dug-out, such a brave, sweet picture of protection for her deformed father that even Dick Hines, villain and rough character though he was, was struck by it, and wheeled his horse around as if he would depart immediately.

"Stranger, I reckon yer kin use ther dugout ternight, but I give yer warnin' ter git off'n ther claim afore tomorrer sunset."

"Yer very kind, I'm shore," returned Hamlet with quiet scorn, "ter 'low me ther privilege o' 'bidin' overnight on my own property."

"Remember," said Hines, unheeding the other's sarcasm and putting his revolver in his belt, "yer ter be off'n this hyer claim afore tomorrer sunset."

"Thank yer fur repeatin' it; my memory's plumb good yit," Hamlet made answer, in spite of Nancy's whispered warning to say no more to the armed villain.

"I've give yer ample warnin'," Hines concluded. "I don't want no trouble with yer, but unless yer off'n ther claim by tomorrer night yer kin expec' ter be waited on by a committee app'inted ter 'tend ter sech cases as yer'n."

"Waal, I 'low yer committee couldn't wait on er better man than Adam Hamlet," the new settler flung after Hines, as he put spurs to his horse and rode swiftly away in the darkness.

Next morning as they ate their breakfast Nancy said:

"Pap, I'm thinkin' maybe yer'd best quit the claim an' save fussin'. Thet Hines is a desp'rate man."

"Yes, I 'low he is, but I aim ter make him a heap more desp'rater afore I quit this hyer claim I've come so fur ter git," replied Hamlet, spreading molasses on his cornbread, and eating his coarse fare with keen relish.

"I reckon it would be kinder hard fur me ter leave the claim now thet I've been settin' such store on havin' a home of our own, after livin' on a rented place so long. It's a mighty purty place hyer, pap, an' I'm gittin' 'tached ter livin' hyer already," said the girl, as she gazed about her.

The large drygoods box which served them as table, and at which they now sat, was placed just outside of the dug-out door, and where they could command an uninterrupted view of the surrounding country for miles away. It was a wild but beautiful view indeed.

Miles and miles of trackless prairies, clothed in richest green and rarest wild flowers, sloped gently away, until the eye encountered a line of timber, fringing some stream in the distance. The warm amber of a glorious sunrise burnished the landscape and increased its natural loveliness to a great degree.

On some of the little "swells" in the plain flocks of cattle and ponies of all colors could be seen grazing on the bedewed grass of early morning, while a spiral wreath of blue smoke here and there, outlined against a cloudless sky and appearing afar off, marked the location of a settler's cabin.

It was the Kansas of nature, before the settlers had turned her broad acres into the fertile fields of corn and wheat, as the traveler sees them today.

"Ain't it purty, pap?" asked the girl, too deeply lost in admiration of the scene to eat.

"Too purty ter be scart from by a low-down critter like that sneakin' Hines," answered Hamlet, finishing his coffee and rising from the table.

"No, Nancy," he said, after a pause, "I think you an' me an' our traps will 'bide hyer at the dugout a spell spite o' that varmint's threats. His talk's too thin fur me ter swaller. He just aims ter scar' me off ther claim, but he'll be plumb disappointed, I 'low. Nancy, yer kin jest go erhead an' fix up ther dugout ter suit yerself, while I hammer up some kind o' brush shed fur the beasts. We'll not spare ther time ter ask Hines ef he's willin'."

So saying, Adam Hamlet took spade and ax and walked a short distance down a wide ravine, where he found a load of poles and heavier timber which Ik Pender had cut and hauled from the woods but had not used. With this timber he began the construction of a rude shed, which would serve as a shelter for the animals when it stormed.

While Hamlet worked away on his shed down the hollow Nancy was not idle. She was a skillful housekeeper, and she had soon put the dugout through a process of complete renovation. The underground apartment was not very generous in its dimensions, but their household goods were not very numerous, and there were but two persons to become inmates of it, so they could easily manage to exist there until they were able to build more comfortable quarters. How many of our brave pioneer folk like them have patiently borne with hardships, and lived in dugouts or uncomfortably cramped and wretched cabins, that the untamed prairies might be reclaimed from the savage and the wilderness, and made, after many struggles, fruitful and fitted to the needs of civilized humanity. They are real benefactors, and the world owes them such a great debt of gratitude that will never be redeemed. But their deeds of valor and noble sacrifices are recorded on the scroll of history, and we cannot utterly ignore them, should we have the disposition to do so.

Before night Hamlet had his shed completed, even to covering one side and the end and top with brush and dead sunflower stalks gathered from the ravine; and Nancy had made the dugout as habitable as it was possible to make it.

They had received no visits that day from any of their distant neighbors, and had almost forgotten Dick Hines' threats, when Nancy, who had been down to the creek for a bucket of water, heard through the darkness of the night the rapid approach of several horsemen. There was no moon yet, so she could distinguish nothing in the starlight but several dark forms, whose horses were bearing them with mad speed onward toward the lonely dugout.

She bent her head in a listening attitude, for she was certain that she had heard one of them laugh in a gruff voice. But she could hear no words, only the swish, swish of the horses' feet as their riders urged them over the prairie. She strove again to pierce the intervening space with her clear hazel eyes, but she could not make out the shadowy forms.

"What does it mean? Who kin it be cavortin' 'round over the prairies?" she asked herself.

Suddenly she remembered Dick Hines' unpleasant visit of the evening before, and leaving her bucket, she ran swiftly up the grass grown path to the dugout, before which she had left her father seated on a bench smoking his old clay pipe. In an excited voice she cried:

"Pap, I reckon that Hines an' his low down gang air comin'. Don't yer hyar 'em?"

"Yes, I've heerd 'em, Nancy," replied Hamlet, "an' I'm awaitin' ther attack," and she noticed that he had an old musket in his hand, which he had captured from a soldier in the late war. "Hyer, child! Get in ther dugout and let me shut ther door. I reckon ef ther bent on playin' Injun I kin show 'em I ain't erfeared. I've faced too many Johnnie Rebs in my time ter be scart out by a passel o' sich bushwhackers as them ens."

He pulled Nancy into the dugout and closed and bolted the big rough door, which was composed of two large, heavy oak boards nailed together.

"Hello in thar!" yelled Dick Hines, halting with his gang, a half dozen rough looking fellows, all heavily armed, before the dugout.

"Hello yerself!" Hamlet called back from a hole beside the door.

"Come out o' thar, an' let this hyer committee show yer how we do up a claim jumper in Kansas."

"I'm 'bliged ter yer fur the invitation, but I'd ruther be excused frum takin' any lessons frum sich er pack o' bushwhackers as yer," Adam Hamlet answered.

"Ef yer don't come out peaceable-like we uns will bust in an' fetch yer out," threatened Hines, while poor Nancy stood shuddering with the wildest apprehensions by her father's side.

"Bust away! I've got somethin' hyer in my hand thet kin bust, too, when I'm er mind ter pull the trigger."

"Look hyer, ole chap! This is Dick Hines' claim, and we uns aim ter help him hold it," said one of the uncouth horsemen.

"It's Adam Hamlet's claim, got in a fair and squar' swap from Ik Pender, back in Illinoy, an' I aim ter hold it."

"Ain't yer goin' ter open thet door?" demanded Hines impatiently.

"What yer need with ther door open?" mockingly asked Hamlet.

"We uns want ter git our paws on yer, ye white livered claim jumper, yer!"

"Yer do? Waal, why don't yer git off yer hosses an' try it, then? I'm ready fur yer, an' ther fust one ter come a step nearer this dugout will git a dose o' genywine lead. Thet's what!"

"I dare yer out hyer!" said Hines.

"An' I dare yer in hyer!" Hamlet returned contemptuously.

"This is gittin' mighty thin, ole man."

"Very waal, Mr. Hines, when yer an' yer august committee gits tired yer at liberty ter retire when yer please."

"None o' yer gol-durned sass in thar or I'll riddle thet spring halt ole door with bullets," growled Hines, growing angrier every moment, as he saw himself and his cowardly allies held at bay by one man.

"Yer best try it ef yer itchin' ter git ther contents o' this hyer musket o' mine poured inter yer miserable carcass. I'd ruther save my ammunition fur buzzards, wolves an' sich, but I'm not begrudgin' it ef yer need it wuss'n ther varmints."

"I'm gittin' thunderin' tired o' yer lip, ole man!"

"All right, neighbor Hines, when yer tired of thet thar's a standin' invitation fur yer ter ride off about yer business. I'm able ter run this claim without yer advice."

"An' do yer actilly refuse ter git off'n my claim?" roared the infuriated Hines.

"I'm not on yer claim, an' how kin I git off'n it?"

"I'll give yer somethin' ter season yer sass with ef yer ain't more civil!"

"Yer remarked somethin' simular jest er bit ago."

"I'd make yer whistle er diffrunt song ef yer'd show yerself out hyer."

"It'd be er plump s'prise ter me ef yer didn't tote ther biggest heft o' ther chune yerself, Mr. Hines."

"I'll put a bullet cl'ar through yer an' thet blamed door, both!"

"No, yer don't, Dick Hines!" rang out a clear, manly voice, as a newcomer dashed upon the scene, and did not pause till he had spurred his pony between the gang and the door of the dugout. Hines and his allies shrank back like a pack of cowardly curs before a noble Newfoundland, and sat regarding the intruder with no pleasant grace upon their hardened visages.

"Yer didn't expect Tom Byers hyer ter take a hand in yer little game?" said the young fellow, speaking sternly.

It was with feelings of real gratitude that the trembling girl in the dugout recognized the voice of the young ranchman who had taken supper with them at their camp two nights ago. Providence had surely sent him, she thought.

"It's him—Mr. Byers, pap!" she whispered.

"Yes, it's him, Nancy. Ain't he spunky? Jest listen ter him, will yer?" he chuckled. "He's er match fur er dozen sich vile snipes as them."

And he was, indeed. Tom Byers was well known on those wild prairies as a man of dauntless courage and decided character, one with whom it was not safe to fool. Dick Hines knew the man whom he must now deal with, and although backed by several allies as he was, he had no relish for the encounter.

"What are yer up to, disturbin' Mr. Hamlet this way?" he demanded.

"I was jest a makin' er sort o' call on him, an' tellin' him I held er right ter this hyer claim, thet's all," answered Hines, hoping to lower Tom Byers' wrath against him.

"Well, Mr. Hamlet give yer a very open reception, I jedge, seein' as yer all out hyer in yer saddles yit," laughed Byers with contempt.

"But I'd like ter know by what right yer assert a claim ter this stranger's land?" he asked.

"Waal, yer see Ik Pender bought my mules, an' nuver paid fur 'em, an' when he left ther country I was ter hev his claim," explained Hines.

"Stick ter fac's, ef yer please," cried Byers. "I know more erbout thet mule trade than yer think. Ik an' me was good friends, an' I know his side o' ther story won't tally with yer'n; besides, I happen ter know what become o' them mules!"

"Ther dickens yer do!"

"What did Noah live on when the flood had subsided and his provisions in the ark were exhusted?" asked a Sunday-school teacher of her class one Sunday. "I know," squeaked a little girl, after all the others had given it up. "Well, what?" inquired the teacher. "Dry land," said the child wisely; and the answer passed.

A LITTLE THING.

"It is a little thing to speak a phrase of common comfort which by daily use has almost lost its sense, yet on the ear of him who thinks to die unmourned it will fall like choicest music." It is a simple thing to suffer ordinary pain; but when it comes by day and night with neuralgia's cruel hurt, there's nothing better to cure it than St. Jacobs Oil, which, penetrating to every part that aches, leases the pain and leaves a perfect cure behind it. It's a little thing to do, but the comfort of relief from such distress will make one feel the happier hours of life.

HOPE CRUSHED TO EARTH

Will rise again in the bosom of a dyspeptic wise enough to substitute for the pseudo-tonics, which have bamboozled him out of his belief in the possibility of cure, the real invigorant and stomachic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The bilious, the nervous, the dyspeptic, the rheumatic, alike derive speedy benefit from this helpful botanic medicine. Persons suffering from indigestion will gain no positive permanent good from the fiery, unmedicated stimulants of commerce, too often used recklessly. The Bitters is immeasurably to be preferred to these as a tonic, since its pure basis is modified by the conjunction with it of vegetable ingredients of the highest remedial excellence. Malaria is prevented and remedied by it, and it infuses vigor into the weak and sickly. A wineglassful three times a day is the average dose.

CAUTION.

Imitations have been put upon the market so closely resembling ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in general appearance as to be well calculated to deceive. It is, however, in general appearance only that they compare with ALLCOCK'S, for they are worse than worthless, inasmuch as they contain deleterious ingredients which are apt to cause serious injury. Remember that ALLCOCK'S are the genuine porous plasters—the best external remedy ever produced; when purchasing plasters do not only ask for but make sure that you get ALLCOCK'S.

Rev. Dr. Parker

Is the beloved pastor of the Universalist church at Fargo, N. D., and has also been a pastor in Providence, R. I., New York City and Troy, N. Y. He says:

"I regard Hood's Sarsaparilla the best blood purifier, and I have good reason for this opinion. I am now 80 years of age. Four years ago I was afflicted with rheumatism in my back and limbs, so badly that it was impossible for me to get my usual sleep at night. I had just partially recovered from the grip, which reduced my weight 40 lbs. My appetite was poor and I felt languid and weak. In fact I was in a very dilapidated condition. Having heard and read so much about the wonderful cures produced by Hood's Sarsaparilla I resolved to give it a trial. I followed the directions, and before the fifth bottle was finished my appetite was restored. I felt invigorated and strong. My rheumatic difficulty had entirely disappeared. I cannot but think very highly of Hood's Sarsaparilla."—J. N. PARKER.

AN EFFECTIVE REMEDY.

Chemistry as a deterrent of crime is yet undeveloped, but there is a certain young man who has made some remarkable advances in that direction.

Although he has spent much of his life in hotels and boarding houses, he lost his patience the other day when he discovered that his toilet accessories were subject to a strange and inexplicable disappearance.

He complained to the landlady, but for all that the mysterious disappearances continued. Bottle after bottle of cologne suffered from most mysterious leakage, and, to add to his other woes, his whisky just as strangely disappeared. He suffered as long as human endurance suffers before rising to the sticking point, and then he laid a trap for the offender.

At dinner that evening the dessert was about to be brought when a series of piercing shrieks came from the direction of his bed room. The boarders rushed upstairs. On the upper landing there sat what was recognized as the wreck of the household's chambermaid. Her face was black as the skin of a Zanzibari negro, and her hair, a carroty red in its natural state, was streaked and spotted from the nape of her neck to her forehead. She was sick—sicker than was ever transatlantic traveler in a hurricane. Between her gasps she raved and shrieked like a manaic, while the young man laughed heartlessly at her plight.

"I am poisoned," shrieked the chambermaid, and pointing to the young man, she yelled with venomous hate, "that man has killed me!"

The situation began to get so strained that the landlady drew the young man aside for an explanation. The boarders, anxious to have the mystery explained, followed.

"What have you done to my maid?" the landlady asked.

And then it all came out.

"You remember that I spoke of mysterious thefts in my rooms?" said the culprit. "Well, they did not stop when I complained, so I took my own precautions that they would not continue.

"From the condition of your maid I infer that she has again been helping herself to my cologne and whisky. This circumstantial evidence signifies that she first took a large drink of whisky, and then proceeeded to bathe in the cologne. To the fact that there is a quantity of tartar emetic in the whisky is due her appearance of nausea, and a reasonable explanation for the peculiar color of her complexion is the combination of nitrate of silver with the cologne.

"Your chambermaid will be unable to appear in public for a few days, but I hardly think that she will disturb my property again."

All the other boarders agreed with him. Although the maid did not die the young man had to move, but he considers that the success of his experiment amply repays him for his annoyance.

SCENES IN EGYPT.

The Pyramids Somewhat Disappointing at First Sight.

INTRICACIES OF ARAB QUARTERS.

Oriental Rugs Galore—Hosts of Half-Naked Children—Women With Time-Ravaged Features.

If you have never been to Cairo in a duststorm the very best thing to do is to keep the record unbroken, for of all disagreeable things experienced since coming abroad I think that is the worst. There is no such thing as getting away from the dust, as it percolates through every crack and cranny in your room, and the waiters when complained to about the coffee being muddy lay it entirely to the sandstorm. There is nothing possible to be done but possess one's soul in patience and wait for the clouds to roll by.

It is quite the usual thing to ride up the hill to the citadel, from which a fine view can be obtained; in fact, there are those who say it is the finest view in the world. You gaze over the Coptic churches of old Cairo, the time-worn mosque of Sultan Hasan, the endless domes, minarets, flat-roofed houses, winding streets of the newer city, away to the rolling Nile, the green plains, the acacia groves of Ghesireh, to and away beyond the pyramids. A subdued hum comes up from below, a mingled music compounded of the cries of water-carriers, the shouts of the running Sais, the chatter of itinerent Arabs, the eager voices of the tourists, the clatter of carts loaded with earthenware pottery, or fragrant with green loads of provender for the donkeys; the groaning of the camels—which growl if they are made to lie down when standing and protest with equal vehemence if they are made to stand, when lying down; the barking of dogs, the noise of innumerable dusky children and the lively strains of a regimental band. While each sound can be readily distinguished from the others, there is harmony in it all that mounts the air and floats away to enliven the loneliness of the sphinx. The way back leads one through the intricacies of the Arab quarter, where one sees the keepers of the little stores seated most solemnly on the counters, smoking, drinking powerful coffee from tiny china cups, conversing in low tones, but always with their long, liquid, dark eyes on the watch for your approach; always ready to stretch out their hands filled with tempting gewgaws; always waiting to get the better of you in that polite and elevating wrangle which invariably precedes the clinching of a bargain. An Indian wearing a stiff cap with gold embroidery holds out a dusky hand filled with precious stones; a Persian opens out exquisite carpets, displays before your eyes tempting embroideries. There are oriental rugs galore, saddlebags, kneeling carpets and embossed ware without end, and while you wait you are regaled with cigarettes and coffee.

If you tire of the city's attractions you can ride about the environs and get an idea of the real life of the place. Here and there appear small, dingy cafes with their few customers. Dislocated trellis-work, half covered with torn netting, shreds of old cloth rotting on sticks fixed into the masonry, hanging on cords stretched from the walls to the sycamores, cast a little shade on the rickety tables, broken-legged chairs and worm-eaten benches. Fowls peck about, pigeons swoop down, reddish goats with white spots, flat snouts, long flexible ears, frail limbs and inflated bellies come here for shelter.

Hosts of half-naked children, deliciously picturesque, in their rudimentary rags, bound out of dilapidated homes. They raise clouds of dust in the wildness of their gambols, wallowing amid deafening cries in the ruts of the road.

Camels with undulating necks gaze vaguely about them with their great, sad eyes, walking silently with their heaving motion, urged on by voice and gestures of somber Bedouins perched upon their summits. The petulant faces and fretful eyes of these animals have a strange fascination about them, notwithstanding the fact that somebody has called them "a second-hand looking animal," a name by no means ill adapted to their appearance.

Women with time-ravaged features, with sordid garments, pass by with babies seated astride their shoulders. Little girls clutching their gowns with the hand, leather amulet around the neck or suspended between the two eyes, in flowing chemises of a crude, color, the head bound in a fichu of torn, spotted muslin, trot along beside them, supple as young snakes, shaking in the wind their fine, plentiful black tresses. Their little arms are encircled with bracelets, a smile plays on their weet brown faces, casting a glow into their dark eyes; their pearly teeth shine white, moist between their red lips, resembling drops of dew fallen on gaping pomegranates.

A day, and to lovers of the ancient several days, may be passed in the museum, where there is much to study and interest one. For here can be traced the march of civilization almost from its earliest beginning, as well as more or less that went on before it. From what one can judge of the statues, pictures, carvings, appearance of the mummies, and other things that are to be seen from time to time, the highest type of Egyptian was tall and slender, with something that was both proud and imperious in the carriage of his head and in his whole bearing. He had wide full shoulders, well-marked and vigorous pectoral muscles, muscular arms, a long, fine hand, slightly developed hips and sinewy legs. The long, thin and low arched feet generally appear flatened out at the extremity, which would seem to indicate that they went barefooted. The head is rather short, the face oval, the forehead somewhat receding, the mouth long, the lips full and lightly ridged along their outline. The teeth are small, even, well set and remarkably sound. At birth the skin is white but darkens in proportion to its exposure to the sun.

Men are generally painted red in the pictures, though, as a matter of fact there must already have been all the shades which one sees among the present population, from a delicate rose complexion to that of a smoke-colored bronze. Women who were less exposed to the sun, are generally painted yellow, the tint paler in proportion as they rise in the social scale. The hair was inclined to be wavy and even to curl into little ringlets but without turning into the wool of the negro.

The lower class were swart, dumpy and heavy; the features are coarse, and as though carved in flesh by great strokes of the roughing-out chisel. Their unattractive and at times somewhat ludicrous physiognomy, now and again animated by an expression of cunning, which recalls the shrewd face of an old French peasant, is often lighted up by gleams of gentleness and of melancholy good nature. The external characteristics of these two principal types, whose endless modifications are to be found on ancient monuments, may still be seen among the living.

The houses were not much better than low huts of wattle daubed with puddled clay or bricks dried in the sun. They contained one room, either oblong or square, the door being the only aperture. Only the dwellings of the richer class were large enough to make it needful to support the roof by means of one or more trunks of trees, which did duty for columns. Earthen pots turned by hand, mats of reeds or plaited straw, two flat stones for grinding corn, a few pieces of wooden furniture, stools and head rests for use at night comprised all the contents. The men went about nearly naked, except the nobles, who wore a panthers' skin, sometimes thrown over the shoulders tometimes drawn around the waist and covering the lower part of the body, the animal's tail touching the heels behind. The women were at first contented with a loin cloth like that of the men; it was enlarged and lengthened till it reached the ankle below and the bosom above, and became a tightly fitting garment with two bands over the shoulder to keep it in place. Both men and women loved ornament, and covered neck, dress, arms, ankles and wrists with many rows of necklaces and bracelets.

Weapons, at least among the nobility, were an indispensable part of the costume. Most of them were for hand-to-hand fighting—sticks, clubs, lances furnished with a sharpened bone or stone point; axes of flint, sabers and clubs pointed or rounded at the end, with blunt or sharp blades, formed the chief weapons, inoffensive enough to look at, but, when wielded by a vigorous hand, sufficient to break an arm, crush in the ribs or smash a skull. In addition, they had the sling, the javelin and the boomerang, a missile almost forgotten nowadays. Long before historic times the majority of the weapons in wood had been replaced by those of metal—daggers, sabers and hatchets—which preserved, nevertheless, the shape of the older wooden instruments.

One could hardly be sure one had been to Cairo and Egpyt unless the pyramids were visited and a look had at the Sphinx. The pyramids, hackneyed though they are, appeal to many, although to me personally they were somewhat disappointing at first sight. However, when close to them their vast proportions were again resumed. I fancy to those who have gone to their summits there is never even a lingering doubt as to their size.

The pyramids are built in regular layers of a compact limestone rock, and as each tier recedes from the contour of the one next below it has somewhat the character of a gigantic stairway. But if one who has never made the ascent attempts it he will soon find that two, and possibly three, guides are necessary to hoist him up. The summit of Cheops, commonly known as "the great pyramid," is a platform about thirty feet across, while the base covers an area of about thirteen acres.

From where we stood an excellent view of the Nile valley was possible, and it formed an attractive belt of green from far away into the desert of hills, rocks and sand, to where it spread into the delta plain below the capital. The river winds along this strip of verdure like a silver thread in a web of emerald. Here and there are groves of palms and signs of habitation reaching to the borders of the land of Goshen, where Joseph's brethren dwelt, and toward the north to the Mediterranean. On the other hand is the trackless desert, a broken region of rock, hill and sandy plain, while in still another direction we can almost see the borders of the great Sahara itself. Nowhere else are fruitful fields and sterile plains brought into such propinquity, and nowhere else do they present so striking contrasts.

Near by is also the inexplicable Sphinx reigning in its glorious ugliness more surely than any superb beauty. It is a strange combination of beast and man which keeps its stony eyes fixed upon the illimitable sands, as it has done ever since the historic period of the world began. Recent excavations show it to have been carved from the rocky cliff on which it rests.—Chicago Record.

Boston has had another fire where the overhead wires badly hampered the department in its work, and the result is a renewed clamor for their removal from the streets.

REPRESSION OF CRIME.

Society Rendered Hideous by the Criminal Classes.

ARE OFTEN VICTIMS OF HEREDITY.

Lady Cook, nee Tennessee Claflin, Discourses on a Remedy for the Existing Evils—Man's Heartlessness.

The criminal classes who render every form of society hideous in many of its aspects, would soon die out and be extinguished were it not that they are permitted to breed new swarms of human pests without the slightest restriction. No sooner have we incarcerated the sires in vice—after, it may be, their long and successful career—than we find the sons continuing the war upon our persons and property. The cost of our prisons and police forms only a part of the insurance we have to provide on account of the savages in our midst, whose hands are against every man. Those who deviate from honesty are few, indeed, compared to those who make fraud and theft a life profession; the former may be reclaimed, the latter never, beeause it is their nature to war upon society. Often they are the victims of heredity, and philosophically considered have then, perhaps, as little responsibility for their actions as the dog that bites. A wolf is always a wolf; an hereditary criminal will always commit crime if he can.

Thefts, frauds, and outrages up to murder, are not the only evils they inflict on us. They infect the whole community with an immoral taint. It is impossible for our young to peruse in the daily papers the records of their wickedness without being worse for it, to say nothing of any stronger influence they may exercise. Tales of ravishing, robbery, murder, are not edifying literature for youthful minds. At the best, these are likely to absorb some portion of the immorality thus infiltrated through them.

Effectual means, however, are at hand to prevent our annual crops of criminals, could we only be persuaded to adopt them. The most potent, but least palatable, would be to render them incapable of propagating. Another is to make human breeding a science, and education another. At present they both proceed haphazard, whereas they require profound study and strict method.

We English are unsurpassed in the art of breeding of inferior animals—from a salmon to a shorthorn, from a pigeon to a racehorse. The method is no secret. All understand it. Healthy animals only, with the best points and free from hereditary taint, are selected. They are mated carefully, and the strains are preserved pure from all deteriorating blood and damaging conditions. But in the rearing of the highest animals these salutary maxims are ignored, and many men of natural affection and intelligence bestow more pains on the mating of their dogs than on that of their daughters. Our workhouses, prisons, refuges, penitentiaries, and lunatic asylums, bear sad witness to these inequitable laws and customs. Into them are crowded hosts of unhappy women—thousands of them mere girls—victims without redress of man's brutality and heartlessness; and they wear out their pitiful and cheerless days to the end, too many of them, alas! having been dowered with the fatal gift of beauty. Usually it is the ardent girl of generous disposition, the least calculating, and the most artless who is lured to her destruction. Nature is strong in her, and affection dominates. Her embraces go with her heart. If society and the law could be compassionate to any, they should be tender to her. But both are implacable. She is appalled by their unrelenting severity and in her mad terror is often impelled to destroy the witness of her wrong doing. But even should she spare her innocent offspring, the law still pursues him. He cannot inherit, except by will, and if he dies intestate, the Crown seizes all his property.

Owing to their exclusion from the higher grades of employment, women of the better classes are given over to useless and frivolous pursuits. Dress and fashion, amusements and flirtations, mainly make up the trivial round of their occupations, and act as bars to all solid intellectual work. Yet who can blame these gilded butterflies of society for being what their fathers and husbands have made them? A leading London paper assures us that, "Every year witnesses vast increase in the working popluation of England, coupled with a growing decrease in the amount of labor to be disposed of." Thus the ranks of the proletariat are constantly being swollen, and among them their women have to endure and to suffer most. Their maternal instincts are frequently crushed out of them by their vicious and squalid surroundings. Thousands of infants are annually overlaid, smothered by the mothers who bore them; and one child out of every ten dies before the end of its first year.

The evils enumerated are monstrous in an age and country like ours, and calls for immediate redress. There must be no flinching from any remedial process, however abhorrent it may be to our preconceived ideas and prejudices, provided some cure can be effected. Radical diseases require drastic treatment, and loathsome excrescences must be removed by an unsparing use of the knife. To begin with, sex privileges and sex disqualification should be abolished, and a fair field given to all alike. Let each be permitted to be and to do whatever he or she is able.

Boys and girls should be educated alike, and should compete with each other in studies and sports. What is good for boys is good for girls. Mothers should encourage entire confidence between their daughters and themselves, and carefully instruct them in regard to all that concerns their future. Nothing should be left to chance or to purrient instructors. The mother is the fitest teacher of her daughter. How many girls would have been spared miserable lives had they been blessed with sensible mothers? Women should have the same right to propose to men as men have to women. It is the mother who for weary months will bear her child beneath her heart, and for years will nurse it in her bosom. Will she desire an idiot, a drunkard, a weakling? No! she longs for a manchild, one who will be tender, wise, and valiant.

Woman is a hero-worshipper, and desires to produce heroes. Her instincts are true, and she will select the bravest and best of men for her husband. If left to Nature, the fittest would survive. But, as things are, the unworthiest increase most rapidly. The ignorant and the improvident give the reins to their passions, and threaten to overwhelm us with the "multiplication of the unfit." Even those weighed down with heriditary or contracted maladies do not stint themselves. They marry, and are given in marriage. The prudent and the wise exercise restraint. If it be true that labor does not increase in proportion to the increase of population, legislative measures will have to be adopted to prevent the marriage of the unfit. What has been done from motives of religion, from luxury, or choice, may perchance be done again from necessity.

Criminals, hereditary paupers, profligates, and others afflicted with gross bodily or mental defects, should not be allowed to marry. Then our prisons, workhouses, and asylums, would at no great distance of time be empty. Many hospitals would be swept away. Pauperism would cease. Disease would be almost unknown. Our race would be raised to the highest pitch of perfection and excellence. The people who shall first have the moral courage to do this will take the lead among the nations of the world.

Profoundly imbued with this optimistic creed, we gladly see the old years die, and hopefully welcome in the new. The throes of new births are around us. The air is full of whispered agonies. The hearts of men are beginning to beat in harmony with the pulsations of time. There are, therefore, great possibilities in the near future. Courage, my sisters! The hour of woman's freedom draws nigh!—English Family Doctor.

MEAT EATING AND MUSCLE.

In an article contributed to the "Health Culture," by Dr. Felix L. Oswald, it is maintained that what are called "canine teeth" are a misnomer, are not canine in any sense of the term. These fangs, the doctor goes on to explain, corresponding to the eye-teeth of man, are enormously developed in several species of baboons that would unhesitatingly prefer a bunch of fox-grapes to the best beefsteak that could be found in a Delmonico. Dr. Oswald is not a believer in humanity's being altogether carnivorous. "The meat delusion" is what he terms the idea that man canot thrive on a strict vegetable diet. The fact that normal children have an aversion to flesh food in its undisguised state cannot be overlooked as an argument in behalf of the vegetarian. Meat promotes muscle and conduces to longevity. The doctor says:

"Under anything like favorable climatic conditions, these frugal Orientals outlive their carnivorous neighbors, and the anti-vegetarian argument founded on their lack of muscular development has been triumphantly refuted by the statistics of Dr. Herman Beyer, who proves that the stoutest peasants of continental Europe value meat only as an occasional luxury, rather than an important or indispensable article of daily food. The iron-fisted Russian boors live chiefly on rye bread, milk and cabbage; the Danes on milk and potatoes, the peasants of Holstein (where the Prussian navy recruits its brawniest seamen) on milk, porridge, butter and beans. The Turkish longshoremen, the stoutest bipeds of the present world are strictly frugal from necessity, if not on religious principle. They cook their rice with ghee, or clarified butter, and after a light breakfast of barley bread and dried figs, think nothing of shouldering a weight of three hundred pounds, and in gangs of four will lug off burdens which a New York expressman would hesitate to load on a one-horse wagon."

The conclusion drawn from Dr. Oswald's investigation is that a total abstinence from flesh food would promote the cause of moral as well as physical health, and contribute more than all the conventions of millennium prophets to guarantee the blessing of international peace.—Cincinnati Times-Star.

A STORY OF TOLSTOI.

Leo Tolstoi, the Russian novelist, who has ideas of his own as to the right of the community to punish its offending members, saw the other day a policeman take an individual into custody. He at once walked up to the constable and said:

"Can you read?"

"Certainly, sir."

"Have you read the Scriptures?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then you forget that they command us to love our neighbors as ourselves."

The minion of the law, quite taken back, stared at the Count; then, after a moment's reflection, made answer:

"And, pray, can you read?"

"Yes."

"Have you read the police regulations?"

"No."

"Then read them."

TWO FAMOUS ROADS.

The Palm-Bordered Thoroughfares of Honolulu.

SCENE OF THE RECENT UPRISING.

Fish Ponds and Villas—Lords Sans Souci—Hawaiian Hospitality—Sea Bathing—Historic Pali.

From the sea the approach to the Hawaiian Islands is most forbidding. There are great, naked peaks, showing grim evidences of fierce volcanic action; the verdure of the valleys at their feet is hidden, and the city itself embowered in rich tropical foliage can scarcely be defined through the forest of masts in the harbor.

There are two favorite drives for the tourist who stops over for the day in the Hawaiian capital en route to Australia, or to China or Japan. These are the roads to the Pali and to Waiki.

Pali is a Hawaiian word meaning precipice. The "a" and "i" are both short—the word rhymes with "folly." The Pali is a cleft in the mountain ridge that runs through the Island of Oahu (pronounced wa-hoo) upon which Honolulu is situated. All the islands are extremely mountainous and, for this reason, there is a vast difference in the windward and leeward sides of each. When the trades can bring in the moisture from the sea, which evaporates and falls in abundant rain, the fertility of the soil is incredible. But when the clouds are caught by the mountain peaks and the moisture squeezed out of them there are great stretches of dreary lava in which a few weeds spring up and where only the omnipresent algeroba can be made to grow. But for the Pali above Honolulu there would be little or no rain in the outlies back of the city. As it is, the Pali acts as a sort of blower, and the wind sweeps through the opening frequently with such violence that it is dangerous to venture upon the road at the summit except on foot. The provision is always made when expeditions to the Pali are planned, "If it is not blowing too hard."

It is the thoroughfare to the plantations on the other side, and so steep is the descent that the supplies have to be carried down the road over the precipice on pack mules. One sees the sure-footed little animals loaded and waiting for their masters everywhere in the side streets in Honolulu—meeting them afterward trotting along in charge of Japanese laborers.

The road leading up to the Pali is beautiful in the extreme. It is reached through Nuanu avenue—the most charming of all the streets in the city, shaded by overarching tropical trees—along which are residences with their palm-bordered drives and emerald lawns. Beyond the city—passing the English cemetery and the tomb of the Kamehamehas—the valley narrows and the steep slopes rise on either hand, green, as it will be seen on nearer view, with a dense growth of lantana.

Clouds float down over their summits and here and there a stream sparkles in the sunshine or a cascade dashes downward, disappearing in the vegetation below. Along this road the waterworks are also situated, fed by these pure mountain streams and furnishing the city with one of the purest water supplies in the world. Here and there may be seen the low walls of lichen-covered volcanic stone inclosing tiny plots of ground which were the tarro patches of the aboriginal Hawaiians, in the midst of which the owner built his grass house. These plots were not more than seventy-five feet square and the allotment was made when the island was densely populated, and it was necessary to induce the people to till the ground, to raise sufficient food. In addition to this, large artificial fish ponds were constructed, stocked with mullet, one of the most delicious and delicate of fish. The fish ponds are in exsitence and still teem with mullet. The largest of them may be seen from the Pali road—almost like a small lake—lying at the foot of the mountains, near Pearl Harbor. Half way up the ascent the view is one of the most beautiful on the globe—the city lying far below, half hidden by palms and mangoes, beyond which is the harbor with the ships lying at anchor, and still beyond this the tropical sea, blue as a sapphire, the sunken reef defined by the tossing surf, white as snow and breaking forever against the hidden coral. In every direction stretch valleys of surpassing lovelines with Pearl Harbor at one extremity and the imposing peak of Diamond Head at the other. Close at hand are heights of imposing grandeur, and over all bends the tender blue of the southern sky. The islands were sometimes called by the natives "The Islands of Rainbows," and they well deserve the name, for nowhere in the world is this phenomenon so perfect and so beautiful. The wind bringing the mist from the sea through the Pali, it spreads in vapor or fine rain along the mountain sides upon which the sun shines, and which are then spanned not only by a single arch, but frequently by two. They seem to spring out of the wooded gorges or from the top of Tantalus, the highest peak resting in Diamond Head.

The descent into the valley beyond the Pali, as has been explained, is so steep that it is an almost perilous ride except in calm weather. From this point, also, there is a fine view—the sea again, far below, dashing against the rocks, with miles of sugar plantation, the most vivid green in nature.

King Kamechamcha I., the "Great Kamehameha," who consolidated the government of the islands of which he then became sovereign, fought a great battle along the Pali road. The conquest of Oahu was accomplished by the killing of the leader of the natives, Kaiana, who was struck by a cannon ball, after which his followers were driven up the road to the Pali and forced over the verge, where their bones were found many years later. Professor Alexander states that this battle occurred in the month of April, 1795.

The Weikiki road follows the beach around Diamond Head. Wakiki, Isabella Bird called the Brighton of Honolulu. It is famous for its incomparable sea bathing. The road is in fine condition, being always kept in repair. In the suburbs here and there, are picturesque little shops where fruits and vegetables are offered for sale, and about which are always to be seen quaint little Chinese children with their queues lengthened by bright pink cotton cord, and on holidays dressed in silks and brocades of great splendor.

Toward the sea are almost continuous groves of stately cocoanut palms—one plantation so dense that the sky is almost shut out. In another is a pond filled with gold-fish, in the midst of young palm trees. Where the road touches the beach a massive wall of stone has been built. All the way there is a succession of villas, each with its bit of beach for bathing—which is one of the most popular amusements, dividing favor with horseback riding. Each villa has its lanai—a floored apartment, open, or protected only by lattice on three sides. The lanai is usually roofed, but one is recalled that was canopied by the impenetrable foliage of the hou tree, whose branches grow laterally to a great length, the leaves being thick enough to furnish protection against all but the heaviest storms.

The lanai is luxuriously furnished with lounges, chairs, and tea tables, and here much of the entertaining is done. If it is a ladies' luncheon, when the guests arrive the first question the hostess asks is: "Will you have a swim?" And if the answer is in the affirmative, as it usually is, the visitors retire, change their apparel for bathing dresses, which are kept in great numbers and of all sizes. After a dip in the sea they return, dress again, and lie about on the couches or lounge and talk until the meal is announced. It is doubtful if there is a woman in Honolulu who is not a fearless and expert swimmer.

Other objects of interest along the Waikiki road are the General Grant Artesian Well—so named at the time the distinguished man made his tour around the world—a native church, Kapiolin's residence, Kapioiani Park, and the modest villa of ex-Queen Liliuokalani. The native church is unpretentious, standing in a shady grove of alscroba trees, but there is a burying ground about it in which the natives spend much of their time sitting, cooking, and eating on and among the graves of their dead. It is a survival of an aboriginal custom when they buried the dead under the floor of their houses or near the doorway, as the Samoans still do.

Above the entrance to the grounds of the dowager ex-Queen Kapiolani, the widow of Kalakaua, is the announcement in Hawaiian, "Kapu" ("Keep Out"), so that it is not open to the public, although invited guests are welcomed with much cordiality. The grounds are extensive, but not very well kept. The ex-Queen lives in a small cottage, the lanai reached from the outside by a flight of steps, the entire front of the house being latticed. She has about her always a great retinue of native men and women, and the patriarchal system prevails among them—the rent of their own lands being paid for in labor. Kapiolani was always greatly respected. She has a strong dislike for Liliuokalani, and has taken no part, directly or indirectly, in the revolution. She understands but does not speak English. The park is a lovely spot, with winding canals, beautiful flowers and trees, and is a favorite drive, especially on those evenings when there are band concerts. Sans Souci, a famous villa, is also on the Waikiki road, and is a favorite resort for tourists who are entertained there. There is the larger building, which has a delightful lanai, with the sea washing against its steps, and there are smaller cottages in which quarters may be had, and where one may wake of a morning and, without raising the head from the pillow, gaze to the horizon line, across the Pacific, and its line of tossing surf.

The grounds of Sans Souci are finely kept, well laid out, and the owner has a passion for flowers and rare ferns which is almost universal among the people of the islands.

Beyond Sans Souci to the foot of Diamond Head the land narrows until the sea is on one side and thickets of lentana on the other, the mountain rising steeply from the undergrowth at its base. The side of the road toward the valleys nearly the entire distance out of the city is bordered by the rice fields and the neat, thriving gardens of the Chinese. They irrigate, so that th esmall vegetable beds are raised to a height of two feet or more, with narrow dykes between them. Their banana fields are treated in the same manner, and, with true Chinese economy in utilizing space, bananas are cultivated in the earth while the little waterways are given over to great broods of ducks that flourish like all things else to which the provident and industrious Chinaman gives his attention.

The Chinese have been well treated in Honolulu and are a very necessary class—being almost universally employed as servants. Prior to their arrival few vegetables were to be had except those that were brought from the coast. The Chinaman came, drained the swamps, tilled the soil, and now everything may be obtained—excellent in quality and extremely cheap.

The white residents could not work out of doors in the heat of the semi-tropical sun and the Hawaiian, who can live on taro, would not.—Mary H. Krout, in Inter-Ocean.

The lively discussion between Mark Twain and Max O'Rell has led to the printing in several Eastern newspapers of stories of Twain's fighting qualities as shown in many instances on this Coast when he was a reporter. They give an anecdote of Mark's encounter with "Red Hot Dick" in Virginia City, wherein Dick shot a cigar out of Twain's mouth and the humorist clipped with a bullet a piece from the desperado's left ear. It is very evident that some old Californian has been giving these papers a big "fill" Mark was never celebrated for his courage out here. In fact he once showed the white feather when some jokers perpetrated a mock stage robbery and relieved him of a few dollars. Wild oxen couldn't haul Mark into a duel any more than they could drag this gasconading Frenchman into any fight in which he would be in danger of having a hole put in his hide.

The long promised suit has been instituted by Attorney General Olney against the Stanford estate to compel the payment of $15,000,000 due on the Central Pacific railroad shares held by the late Senator Stanford. The principle that the individual stockholders of a corporation are liable for the debts of the corporation has been applied to corporations on a small scale in this state and there can be no reason offered why the stocks of enormous railroad corporations should not be equally subject to such law. On this subject a constitutional amendment was passed at the recent session of the legislature and will be submitted at the next general election limiting the liability of stockholders to the par value of their shares.

Sir Rivers Wilson, who came over to this country in the interest of the English holders of Pacific railway securities, has told his clients that there are people of wild Socialistic tendencies in America, and there is no telling what they will do. A little further along in his report Sir Rivers hints that because the people of the United States insist on the Pacific railroad magnates paying the government what they owe it, they are "wild Socialists." Sir Rivers Wilson is apparently of the same mind as Collis Porter Huntington. He spent most of his time while in America being wined and dined by railroad officials, and it is not very difficult to see whence came his inspiration.

As was expected, the Senatorial investigating of the Biggy charges turns out to be a howling farce. There wasn't time, if there were inclination, to go into the examination of the doings of the alleged combine, and the matter rests now on Biggy's bare charge and Dunn's bare denial. The Senate had too much work to perform to pursue the matter and those who take a deep interest in it will have to wait for developments to be made by the Sacramento Grand Jury.

It is a matter of considerable interest to the silver states whether the proposed indemnity of $250,000,000 that Japen will demand from China as a condition on which peace may be restored, is paid in gold or silver. China will have a mighty hard time, raising such an amount in gold. If Japan is willing to accept silver it ought to increase the price of that metal, which would of course help out the people in this country who are mining it.

The fact that a majority of the Reichstag refused to vote congratulations to Bismark on his birthday, goes far to console us for the kind of Congressmen we have. Our Congressmen are not famous for manners, but they have never failed to act decently on complimentary occasions.

The lynching of those Italians in Colorado was probably done by some persons who had not yet learned that Waite, the "through blood to to the bridle rein" man, was no longer Governor, but had been relegated to obscurity long ago with Simpson, Pennoyer and the other fellows who have turned their sculls into bicycle rinks.

Governor Budd has vetoed the anti-scalpers bill which was lobbied through the legislature by Southern Pacific representatives.

Local Items From Various Sources.

KEELER, Cal., March 28, 1895.

Quite an excitement was created in this section of the county last Thursday and Friday by the report that parties named J. Lee P. Meysan had discovered the biggest gold ledge and property ever found in the county, near Indian Wells. Some very rich samples were shown in Keeler, and at least a dozen parties went from Olancha and this place to locate claims. About ten claims have been located and all the available ground has been taken up. No flattering reports have been received only from the first location, which may only be a small rich pocket.

Mrs. J. A. McKinney went to Lone Pine Wednesday after enjoying a pleasant visit here and in Darwin; she was accompanied by Miss Tizzy Boland.

The month of March has saved its reputation, it went out like a lion sure enough; light rains and heavy winds all day Wednesday and Thursday from Keeler and southward.

Jack Gunn came in from Los Angeles on Wednesday's stage, also Mrs. Bert Rhine.

John Barnes returned to Keeler Wednesday after two days visit at Independence on business.

Neil McLean is hauling soda from the west shore of Owens lake, from Acton Bros. claim to the Salt Wells Borax Company; he has a ten animal team.

As this is Lent, don't "borrow" trouble while it is "Lent".

Shee Bros. of Darwin have let a contract to A. McGovern to sink their main shaft fifty feet deeper. While the contract is being finished they have gone to Santa Monica, Mr W. S. Miller of the same place came to Keeler and W. D. Rocheford, their foreman, went to Alvord.

E. C. Garlick of the Argus Mining Co. at Snows Canyon went to San Francisco last week via Reno and will return next Wednesday via Mojave, he went to purchase supplies for the mine and mill.

It is reported that Fred W. Wallace has located a rich gold ledge near Modock and is taking out some very rich ore, and will soon sack the ore and will make a shipment to some good mill, or to Selby and Co.

In order to make an appropriate ending to this article I will close with a prayer—no I mean some poetry:

When you've got a thing to say,
Say it; Don't take half a day.
When your tale's got little in it
Crowd the whole thing in a minute.
Life is short—a fleeting vapor—
Don't you fill the whole blamed paper
With a tale, which at a pinch,
Could be cornered in an inch.
Boil her down until she simmers,
Polish her until she glimmers.
When you've got a thing to say,
Say it, don't take half a day.

Yours Trooly,

Has Made A Strike.

It reported on good authority that Bob Lockett recently refused $6,000 for his claim near Keeler. He has on the dump about two carloads of ore ready for shipment. He has a 300 foot tunnel nearly completed that will strike the ore body at much greater depth than the present working, and it is expected that a valuable property will be developed.

We learn this morning that the ore body has been struck in the tunnel.

A Desert Tragedy.

The Great American Desert adds another mystery to its long chapter of horrors. Through the kindness of S. G. Gregg of Big Pine we learn the following facts: Stle Drouillard and Will Sanger recently went on a prospecting trip east of Big Pine. At a point in Eureka Valley about thirty miles from Big Pine, and over twenty miles from water, they found the skeleton of a man, who from all indications had been dead four or five years. He had undoubtedly perished for want of water. His clothing was scattered around in all directions, indicating the mania which proceeds death from the terrible thirst. On a canvass jacket by the bones of a dog—faithful even in death. In his vest pocket was found the following check:

LAGRANGE, Oregon,
May 12, 1889

Lagrange National Bank, Pay to E. Bricker, or bearer ($6 00) Six Dollars.

S. T. RICHARDSON

The following is a copy of a poll tax receipt also found in his vest pocket:

THE SEAL OF INDUSTRY.

An official report has been published by the Treasury Department recently, confirming the stories of the outrages of pelagic sealing as permitted by the Paris regulations. It appears that the pelagic fleet of the past year has comprised some sixty vessels, which is four less than the fleet of last year. On the other hand, however, some 50,000 skins have been secured in 1894, mostly by Canadian hunters, against about 36,000 in 1893 and 25,000 in 1892. It will be seen that in two years, therefore, the Paris legislation has about doubled the very destruction it was designed to prevent.

It has also been found that pelagic sealing is in large measure directed against the mother seals, which, under our laws, were carefully protected. If this destruction continues, it is estimated that the value of the Pribylov Islands will be practically destroyed within the next five years. The estimated surviving population of the herd is 60,000 or 80,000 small males and 600,000 females.

The revenue of the Canadian government from this source is rapidly increasing, while that of the United States is diminishing. The United States is, moreover, at a great expense to provide a large patrol fleet, and the British government, on the other hand, although owning the majority of the sealing vessels, expends very little for police patrol. This may be clearly seen from the following significant figures. The surviving seals represent a cash value to-day of $7,000,000. During the year 1894 we have lost more than $500,000 of the profits. The present law makes it possible for the Canadian hunters to get about $1,000,000 worth of the remaining seals next year and to obtain an equally unjust share in the years to come, until the seal fisheries are exhausted. The United States, meanwhile, is compelled to pay a large sum annually out of the Treasury to guard and protect the seal fisheries.

At a certain mission-school for colored children, one of the teachers had for days been drilling her class in physiology on the fundamental uses of the skeleton. "Now, children," she said one morning, "who can tell me one of the most important services performed by the bones?" All hands went up but a tiny brown one, belonging to the youngest pupil in the room, was thrust above the others. "You may tell us, Lily," said the teacher.

"Please, ma'am, I know," replied the curly-haired little maiden. "They're to hang the meat on."

The Claim On Deer Creek.

By A. H. GIBSON.

"Yer sold Ik er span a mules on er year's time. Ik hedn't owned ther critters two weeks till they was stoled. Yes, sir, stoled! Ik was down with ther ager at ther time, so couldn't track ther thieves, an' yer come over hyer ter this very dugout, Dick Hines, an' told Ik as yer'd be willin' ter let him hev his note ef he'd fork over fifty dollars in greenbacks, seein' he'd hed sich bad luck in gittin' ther critters stold. Well, Ik didn't hev ther money ter redeem his note from yer clutches, so I loaned it to him. That's how I know so much erbout thet mule business. Yer shelled over ther note ter Ik, fur I seen it arterward in his own hands. So yer hev no more right ter Ik Pender's claim than I hev—an' not as much when it comes down ter ther p'int o' ther matter."

"Waal, I don't b'lieve this humpy backed stranger has got any right on Ik's claim," Hines declared. "He desarves ter be punished fur claim jumpin', an' I fur one favor puttin' him"——

"Shut up yer horn!" interrupted Byers. "I'm hyer ter see fair play, an' I'll see it too."

"Why, Tom," remarked one of Hines' followers, "I thought nobody on the whole Neutral Lands was more 'posed ter claim jumpin' than you."

"An' so I am," returned Byers firmly; "I'm powerful opposed ter claim jumpin' an' all sich low down, lawless doin's thet thar's no manhood in. Ef I know anything erbout ther way ther wind lies, I'm thinkin' Dick Hines is mad because he ain't able ter git ther stranger out an' jump the claim himself."

"Thet's it! Thet's it!" agreed Adam Hamlet, speaking from the door, which he held slightly ajar. "Yer driv' there nail home thet time, Mr. Byers. Hines wants ther claim, an' is tryin' ter scar' me out. Thet's ther shape o' ther hull business."

"Le's settle this dispute hyer an' now," said Tom Byers in a decided tone.

"Mr. Hamlet, didn't yer tell me thet yer had some writin's frum Ik Pender ter prove yer title ter this land?"

"Yes, an' hyer they air right in my inside coat pocket," answered the settler.

"Produce 'em, an' fix a light an' I'll read the dockymint to these doubtin' Thomases," said Byers, alighting from his pony and approaching the door of the dugout.

Adam Hamlet handed to Tom a half sheet of foolscap, on which Ik Pender, in uneven, untidy characters, had written the transference of his quarter section of land on Deer creek.

Lamp or candle the Hamlets had not, so Nancy put a cotton rag into a small can of "meat fryin's," and thus secured a poor, fitful little flame, by which Byers, standing in the door, read slowly but distinctly the following letter:

To Whom It May Concern:

By this here Presents be it known that I have traded my claim on Deer creek, in Cherokee co., Kansas, to one Adam Hamlet of Pinkneyville, Illinoy, who did by mutual consent turn over to me 10 head of big steers for this said claim.

To my old friends out there I recommend said Adam Hamlet as an honest citizen, and ask that you'll treat him white.

ISAAC N. PENDER.

Hines and his gang listened while Byers read the letter, and as soon as he began folding it up they started away. But Tom detained them a few minutes to say: "Hold on, Dick Hines! I want yer to understan' thet Mr. Hamlet's right ter this hyer claim is genywine, and will be supported by all the worthy citizens o' these parts. It won't be well fur yer ef ketched prowlin' round Deer creek. Now go!"

And they went.

Tom Byers lingered at the dugout long after the sound of the horsemen, whom he had put to flight so effectively, had died away upon the calm night air.

Adam Hamlet resumed his seat and his pipe outside the dugout; Nancy leaned against the doorway, like a blushing, drooping wild rose under the clear starlight; while the young ranchman, brave as a Trojan and handsome as a prince, stood by his pony's side, one arm laid carelessly across the saddle.

"I'm plumb glad yer rid up jest when yer did, Mr. Byers," Hamlet remarked.

"I was jest gittin' back frum Fort Scott, and thought I'd ride past an' see how yer was makin' it," Byers explained. "I wasn't countin' on findin' Hines an' his gang hyer. But yer seemed ter take ther visit mighty composed like."

"Waal, it's no good gittin' flustered, I never think; besides I was mixed up in too many hot spurts with ther enemy durin' ther late war ter be scart out easy now. It's been a kind o' trainin' ter me ter bristle up ter every situation of danger thet may rise up in my path," said Hamlet, puffing away placidly at his pipe.

"So yer was in the war jest closed?" Tom Byers asked a little curiously.

"Not as a reg'lar soldier. They wouldn't take me on 'count o' my back, though I plead fur 'em to. But I was in ther Union army, connected with ther commissary department, an' was a nuss in ther hospital camps on the Ohio river fur erbout eight months. I never seen actual service on the battlefield but once, an' thet was when I hed a hand to hand struggle with a Confederate soldier, tripped him up an' captured thet ole musket yonder," and he pointed with pride to the trophy which his muscular force had wrested from the hands of a foe.

Tom Byers examined the old musket with interest, listened while Hamlet related two or three war adventures, then mounted restive Popcorn to ride on to his ranch.

"I don't think Dick Hines will be apt ter bother yer any more, Mr. Hamlet," he said before starting. "He's er coward an' won't do yer no open hurt, an' ther fact that I've got onter his game ter get yer off o' ther claim will tend to keep him scarce. Yer heerd what I told him erbout thet mule business? I kin tell yer more yit. Arter sellin' ther mules ter Ik he hired two o' his gang ter run ther critters off inter Missoury an' sell 'em, when Pender was down sick with the shakin' ager an' couldn't help himself. It's a plain case, an' all I'm watchin' fur is a little more clear proof, an' I'll fix his cake fur him. He lives over on Lightnin' creek with a brother-in-law o' his who ain't no better'n Dick.

"But Hines ain't goin' ter molest yer," he said, with a swift, admiring look directed toward the girl, "fur I aim ter keep an eye on his cavortin's. Good night!" and waving his hand he galloped rapidly away over the prairie.

Adam Hamlet began improvements on his place at once. He broke up the sod, which was soon planted in corn, beans, sorghum and pumpkins. Byers let him have a good milk cow and a fine little riding pony for Nancy, while one of the neighbors spared them some chickens, and Joe Dugan a pig. So the new settlers had fairly started their life on the prairies.

Adam Hamlet wished to secure a legal title to his land on Deer creek. But some of his best neighbors, who were ardent supporters of the "land leaguers," just then vastly stirred up over the disposition which congress had made of the Neutral Lands on which they lived, had repeatedly requested him not to contract with Joy's agents. Hamlet was not in particular sympathy with the "leaguers," being a firm believer in the power and wisdom of the United States government to adjust all land disputes, but the settlers had treated him kindly, and he did not care to anger them. He could wait for the excitement over the land question to subside.

In August, when the sun scorched the prairies with almost torrid breath, Hamlet became a victim to chills and fever, and much of the time was too poorly to leave the dugout.

Added to her customary duties, Nancy had to be her father's nurse and look after the stock.

One evening as darkness was falling over the hot prairie she went down the creek to drive the cow home.

She had proceeded a half of a mile, and was just crossing a wild plum thicket when voices arrested her attention.

Peering through the branches she could just make out two men engaged in earnest conversation. One she instantly recognized as Dick Hines.

CHAPTER III.

The girl drew back within the thicket, afraid to stir, lest her presence might be discovered to the two men.

She hoped they would pass on and let her continue her search for the cow unhindered, but they did not.

Hines and his companion stood just beyond the patch of wild plum, at the very foot of a steep bank on the creek.

What did he mean by his vile presence there on the corner of her father's claim?

Immediately vague fears were aroused within her, and her first impulse was to steal back to the dugout and alarm her father. But quickly the thought came, what good would that do to startle a sick man who would be unable to defend himself, no matter how dark and terrible was the villain's object in being on the claim.

That he must have some villainous motive the girl was very certain, and it suddenly occurred to her that she must be brave, catch Hines' plot from his own lips, and if possible outwit him. She alone must be her sick father's defender if trouble was coming. Creeping a little nearer to the plotters, she distinctly overheard the following dialogue:

"I tell yer, Finley, thar's money in it—heaps an' heaps. Thar's not so valyble er claim as this hyer anywher's on these puraries," Hines was saying with enthusiasm.

"But air yer sure, Dick, thet ther coal vein extends all erlong this crick?" asked his companion.

"Of course I'm sure! Hain't I dug holes hyer all erlong ther creek ter find out? Yes, sir; dug 'em hyer afore thet ole Hamlet come inter ther country, an' had it all made up ter move inter ther dugout when thet ole sinner got erhead o' me. I tell yer I've tested ther creek all erlong hyer, an' thar's big deposits o' ther best kind er coal, enough ter make a dozen men rich, right hyer."

Nancy Hamlet urged her pony forward across the lonely prairie.

"I reckon ther coal business 'll be er lively one on these puraries some day."

"Why, Finley, it's boun' ter be! Kain't holp but be! This hyer's a poorly timbered country, an' coal mines is sure ter be somethin' wuth ownin'. Thar's a railroad comin' frum Kansas City, cl'ar through the Neutral Lands, an' on ter ther Gulf o' Mexico. Ther country 'll be on er big boom purty soon, an' ef we uns control ther coal beds hyer on Deer creek we'll be capitalists afore we know wot we uns air doin'. We uns must hev ther claim, Finley," declared Hines, uttering an oath that must have made the beautiful sensitive roses, growing luxuriantly at his feet, close their tender, fernlike leaves in terror.

"Maybe this hyer settler's already contracted fur the claim?" said Finley.

"No, he ain't. I've been over ter Baxter an' seed ther records. Hamlet hain't ther grit ter contract fur it, havin' been warned by ther league not to. Ther league hain't no use fur ole Joy, an' though Hamlet ain't er leaguer hisself I 'low he's plumb erfeard o' ther s'ciety, an' ain't aimin' ter make ther members mad at him."

"But yer er member o' ther league yerself, Dick."

"Yes," and Hines laughed coarsely, "but durned little I'm keerin' fur it or anythin' else 'ceptin' this claim on Deer creek."

"They'd string yer up ter a blackjack, I reckon, ef yer went back on 'em."

"They hain't goin' ter find it out fur some little spell. Thar's more settlers than yer think fur stealin' slylike inter the land office at Baxter and contractin' fur their claims unbeknowns ter ther league. I tell yer, we uns 'll git er contract fur this piece o' land, let ole humpy live in ther dugout undisturbed till ther leaguers cool off er bit, then we kin show our papers, and run ole Hamlet an' ther gal off."

"Purty slick, Dick; but wot ef Tom Byers gets wind of it? They say he's struck bad on ther settler's gal, an' Tom's mighty hard ter contend aginst, let me tell yer."

"I reckon Tom would be er ugly customer to deal with. Durn his big picter! He's been watchin' me like er hawk this summer, but he's down in ther Injun nation now, pickin' up some shippin' stock, an' I hyar it said thet he's goin' ter sell out his ranch an' leave ther county. Ef he does, we uns needn't fix fur any racket with him, an' ef we uns gits squatted down hyer on ther claim it'll take more'n Tom Byers ter git us off."

"I reckon it would, with the gang frum Lightnin' to back us."

"Thet's wotever!"

"But say, Dick, why don't yer contract fur ther claim yerself, an' not take er pardner?" the other suddenly asked.

THE POPULIST.

Why shouldn't there be a third party? It is true they disturb the smooth running of the regular organizations and sometimes overturn elections, but what is popular is founded on merit. As for instance, among all the remedies used for sprains and bruises, St. Jacobs Oil is the most popular because it is known to be the best; hence it is the Populist in medicine. The more because it cures so promptly and surely. There is no crippling from sprain where this old remedy is used. It imparts new life and strength and the pain vanishes. Truly it is a populist.

EXPOSURE TO CHANGES OF TEMPERATURE.

Public men are constantly liable to danger arising from sudden changes of temperature; sometimes from heat to cold, sometimes the reverse.

Henry Thorne, Traveling Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., writes from Exeter Hall, Strand, London, February 2d, 1888:

"I desire to bear my testimony to the value of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. I have used them for pains in the back and side arising from rheumatic and other causes never without deriving benefit from their application. They are easily applied and very comforting. Those engaged as I am in public work which involves exposure to sudden changes of temperature, will do well to keep a supply of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in their portmanteaus."

HOPE CRUSHED TO EARTH

Will rise again in the bosom of a dyspeptic wise enough to substitute for the pseudo-tonics, which have bamboozled him out of his belief in the possibility of cure, the real invigorant and stomachic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The bilious, the nervous, the dyspeptic, the rheumatic, alike derive speedy benefit from this helpful botanic medicine. Persons suffering from indigestion will gain no positive permanent good from the fiery, unmedicated stimulants of commerce, too often used recklessly. The Bitters is immeasurably to be preferred to these as a tonic, since its pure basis is modified by the conjunction with it of vegetable ingredients of the highest remedial excellence. Malaria is prevented and remedied by it, and it infuses vigor into the weak and sickly. A wineglassful three times a day is the average dose.

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. WAS VERY LUCKY.

Peter Schmidt's Experience With One-Half Dollar.

He Invests It Judiciously and He and His Friends Now Receive $7,500—It Was Just Like Picking It Up in the Gutter, It Came So Easily.

Peter Schmidt, a contractor and builder, residing at 3112 Wabash Avenue, is a very proud man to-day. He is doubly so because he has not only become suddenly rich but was instrumental in securing so good a fortune for three of his friends.

Mr. Schmidt is well along in years and sufficiently possessed with this world's goods to throw aside all trouble and cares. More for pastime than anything else he occasionally speculates, but he always desires that his intimate friends be in with him. Had it not been for this desire he would to-day have been over $6,000 richer. Mr. Schmidt's and his friends' good fortune came about this way:

Like thousands of others he hoped to win a fortune by speculating a few dollars. Accordingly he invested in four 50-cent tickets in the Honduras National Lottery company.

The evening the tickets were purchased, Mary Castil of Englewood called, and Mr. Schmidt made her a present of one-half of one of the tickets. Then the two other friends came and he declared them in on the remaining half ticket. December 18 the drawing was held and ticket No. 28,130 drew the first capital prize of $75,000. The ticket that had been divided between Miss Castil and himself bore that number and therefore drew $7,500. Of this amount Miss Castil secured $3,750 and the balance will be equally divided between Mr. Schmidt and his two friends—they each receiving $1,250 apiece.

When seen by a reporter for The Dispatch, Mr. Schmidt admitted his good luck and said that the company was very prompt in cashing its prizes. He will continue to purchase Honduras tickets and hopes and believes he will again strike the lucky number. His friends pronounce him the luckiest man in Chicago and they want a share in any future business he may transact.—Chicago (Ill) Dispatch, Feb 4.

Planting the Standard

All hail Columbus! Behold the great navigator as he lands. The perils of the deep are past. The clouds of fear have vanished. The night of gloom has ended. In the heavens the sun of success shines resplendent. Morning has dawned.

Imperiously the banner of haughty Spain greets the daylight. Upon its fluttering folds are inscribed the destinies of a new world. Its gleaming surface marks a long advance in the evolution of the human race. It tells a story of prophecy unparalleled, of developement unapproached in the fullness of recorded time. It crowns with triumph the efforts of genius.

The World's Fair contained no finer statue of the great discoverer than this colossal figure. It commanded from its pedestal the eastern entrance to the Administration building. The majesty of its dimensions, the vigor and aggressiveness of its expression and the artistic finish of its composition made it admired as a genuine sculptural triumph.

High Ground and Longevity.

A series of tables prepared from data compiled by the leading physicians of the London hospital show that there are two sorts of pressure which tend to shorten human life—blood pressure within the veins and atmospheric pressure from without. The atmospheric pressure is a very important factor in shortening the duration of life, especially in humid climates. As old age advances the circulation naturally becomes weak and slow, and if the atmospheric pressure is great the heart finds that it has double work to perform. This being the case, the heart itself is not only more likely to rapidly wear out on account of the energy which it must bring into play to overcome the conditions alluded to, but the lungs, kidneys, liver and other vascular organs agitate the great organ of circulation by calling for an increased supply of blood, which is continually being retarded by the outside pressure. Humid regions of high pressure are, therefore, to be shunned by all aged persons or those who from any cause have impaired circulation. The London physicians who compiled the tables mentioned in the opening are of the opinion that persons above the age of 50 may lengthen their lives from 5 to 12 years by living continuously in an atmosphere both light and dry.—Exchange.

Telephone "Visual Service."

Science is after the telephone girl.

She has become accustomed to the most vigorous ringing of bells. Inventiveness has made an attack on her eyes. The Chicago Telephone company is arranging to introduce what is known as the "visual service" or "express" system of exchange. When a man at a telephone wants a number under the new system, all he will have to do is to take the receiver from its hook, when the current is completed, and a light flashes before the eyes of the operator. If the connection is not promptly made, the subscriber can make a dazzling electrical display in the operator's eyes by replacing and lifting the receiver at his will.

Switchboards for this service are being fitted up in the central office of the telephone company, and already 1,800 subscribers have contracted for the new arrangement. A charge is made for the change to cover the cost of the new apparatus necessary.—Chicago Record.

AN ANCIENT TOKEN.

A Curious Coin Whose Origin Is Likely to Remain a Mystery.

Captain Welsh of Welshton has in his possession a great curiosity in the shape of a coin which is probably the most ancient in the world. It is about 1½ inches in diameter and is a mixture of copper and gold.

The coin was found by a negro named Eichelberger on Mr. B. C. Bowman's place, near Welshton. It was at the bottom of a muck bed seven feet below the surface, in what was once the channel of a stream, but is now covered with heavy forest timber.

On one side of the coin is a representation of a man attacking another. Captain Welsh thinks it represents the murder of Abel. On the same side is an inscription, which, though submitted to a number of scholars, has not yet been deciphered, nor have the characters been recognized as belonging to the alphabet of any language now known.

On the other side is a representation of a man, evidently a Caucasian. There is also an inscription on this side which no one has been able to make out, though it has been placed under the most powerful microscopes. The coin was evidently worn as an ornament, as shown by a hole punched near the edge.

Captain Welsh thinks that this coin was made by the same race that built so many of the mounds that still remain to perplex the archæologist; that this race crossed over from Asia at Behring straits and was afterward exterminated by the Indians, who took the coin and wore it as an ornament.—Florida Times-Union.

MEXICAN MINES.

An Establishment for the Reduction of Silver Ore.

THE PRIMITIVE TOOLS EMPLOYED.

Evidence of Untiring Energy and Skill—Miles of Shafts and Tunnels in Solid Rock.

It is an hour's journey for an ore-laden burro from the mouth of the San Juan silver mine in the State of Oaxaca, Mexico, to the glaring white hacienda in the valley below where the owner of the property and his father and grandfathers have lived for 200 years or more.

Not far from the house there is a large yard surrounded by a high stone and adobe wall, and the weary little burros are driven through its gate and eased of their burdens within. Everything about the enclosure—a typical Mexican establishment for the reduction of silver ore by the patio process—bears the stamp of age. Even the stones over which the burros plod are worn down, the adobe walls are cracked and gray, and the movements of the workmen, all Indians in wide hats and rawhide sandals, as they crawl around lazily in the sunlight, seem enfeebled as if from length of years. The whole process is slow but sure, entirely the work of men and decrepit beasts, but eminently adapted to a land where energy counts for little and labor and life are cheap.

At the highest point of the yard stand the arastras, great stone basins in which the ore as it comes from the mines is ground to dust. They consist of six circular pits, each about one foot deep and from ten to twelve feet in diameter, and each bears a strong resemblance when empty to an ordinary park fountain. The bottom of each is paved with flat stones, the hardest that can be found, and the stone sides rise from twelve to sixteen inches high. A large pyramidal rock is placed in the center of each pit. An iron pin is inserted in a hole at its apex, from the top of which two long arms or sweeps extend outward over the edges of the pit. To each of these arms is attached a large crushing stone or drag of irregular shape with a smooth under side. The stones are held in place by strips of rawhide.

When a charge of ore and a little water have been placed in the pit two mules are hitched to the ends of the sweeps and they travel round and round in response to the crack of the driver's whip. When the stone drag has ground the ore to a thin mud it is allowed to flow down through a trough to a pile near the patio, where the sun soon dries it until it is of about the consistency of putty. It is then ready for the patios, two great circular basins about fifty feet in diameter, a few feet deep and surrounded by a low stone wall. All the lower part of the yard is filled with them. Into these the half-dried mud is dumped until the buttom is covered to a depth of about a foot. A small amount of salt is sprinkled over the mass, and then the real work of extracting the silver begins.

At one side of the patio a broad passageway leads to the top of the wall, and over this mules, burros and oxen are driven, and they are soon plunging about in the mud up to their knees. Only the wornout aniamls are used—burros that can no longer carry ore down the mountains and the lame or shoulder-bruised oxen. Outside of the patio stand two Mexicans with long whips in their hands, which they snap threatingly over the animals in the mud. Back and forth all day long, often in glaring sunlight, the animals tread out the mud, and frequently they grow exhausted and drop down and have to be dragged out.

After the mass has been thoroughly mixed it is allowed to stand for a day or longer, and then a layer of mercury, the amount of which is regulated by the amount of silver which the ore will probably assay, is added, and then the cattle and mules are turned in day after day for from two to six weeks, according to the weather and other governing conditions. Each night when the tired beasts come out of the patio their legs, which are covered with the thick mud of the mixed silver ore and mercury, are thoroughly scraped and the precious compound is returned to the patio. In the process of the tramping the mercury, assisted by the salt first added, amalgamates with the silver in the ore. When the trained eye of the head workman thinks this process has been completed the mud is removed and thoroughly washed with water, either in a long trough or in barrels.

The amalgam of silver and mercury, being much heavier than the other parts of the mud, sinks to the bottom, and the thin mud is poured away. Then the amalgam is gathered up and carried to the retort—really the only piece of machinery used in the whole process—where it is heated to a high temperature. The mercury is quickly evaporated, and, passing upward in the form of vapor, is caught in a simple condenser and carried away to be used over again in a repetition of the process. The waste of mercury is very small. The silver left in the retorts is now more completely melted and run into bricks or bars all ready for shipment. It is carried out to the railroad station at La Puebla on the backs of burros, each load being guarded by armed men.

The results of their work reflect credit on the early Spanish miners in Mexico, considering the primitive tools employed and the necessity of making men and beasts do all the work. To-day evidences of their untiring energy and skill may be seen all over Mexico in the shape of shafts and tunnels in the solid rock miles in length and requiring years of labor to complete. Many of them are now deserted, but the proofs of their one-time prosperity still exist.

One of the most noted of these is the Guadaloupe y Calvo, near a town of the same name, which lies hidden away in an obscure corner of the Sierra Nevada range. At the present time the town looks sleepy and deserted, but there are evidences on every hand of former prosperity and wealth. The mine was worked extensively about 1824 by an English company, and produced many millions of dollars. The managers and officers of the company were lavish of their easily-procured silver and made an attempt to surround themselves with all the luxuries of home. A townsite was made by quarrying a level place out of the solid rock in the side of the mountain. The streets, being of rock, needed no paving. Underground sewers were blasted out and a large and substantial mint was erected to coin the silver produced from the mine. The building must have cost an immense sum of money and untold labor. The matched lumber in the floors and ceilings, the glass in the windows and the mortised locks and hinges on the doors were all brought over from England and carried up into the mountains on the backs of burros at great expense.

But seventy years of wind and weather and of the glaring southern sun, to say nothing of the inroads of human despoilers, have left the magnificent building a picturesque ruin in which the wild birds nest. A few of the rooms and vaults are still in a fair condition, and suffice as a shelter in the rainy months of the year for a few half-starved Mexicans. The falling ruins of a concert hall, a club house, and numerous commodious and once beautiful dwellings are some of the other evidences of the habits of these mining managers who lived in a silver El Dorado twenty-five years before California was heard of.

Traditions which have come down tell of the ballet-girls, the billiard tables and the wines which they imported along with their mining machinery. Some of the broken billiard tables still remain to attest the truth of the stories, but the mine managers and the ballet-girls and the wines have long since departed along with the money which the honest English citizen at home invested in the enterprise. To-day the mine is worked in a small way by an American. Every morning the streets show some signs of life, but by noon everyone is sitting about drinking or drunk. "That is the way the Englishmen did," they explain, but they forget that the Englishmen drank champagne, and that they have only "aguardiente"—a cheap Mexican brandy.

The amount of labor which the early Mexican miners must have expended in digging the shafts in the mountain sides can be best appreciated when the fact is known that they had only the crudest implements with which to do their work. A Chicago mine-owner has in his collection of mine curiosities some tools which were taken from under the water of an abandoned mine many hundred feet deep. Two of them are shovels made by binding with thongs of rawhide a short, stout handle of wood to the shoulder blade of some animal. A sledge hammer constructed wholly of live oak, huge and unweildly, shows with what difficulty drills were driven into the solid rock.

All these tools are more than a century old, and yet in some Mexican mines of to-day the implements used are almost as crude.—Chicago Record.

Addison's Characteristics.

Addison is the very embodiment of that delightful gift of humor on which we pride ourselves so much as a specially English quality. That in its way his style is the perfection of English style is less dear and delightful to us than that what it conveys is the perfection of feeling. His art is the antipodes of that satirical art which allows human excellence only to gird at it and insinuate motives which diminish or destroy. Addison, on the other hand, allows imperfections which his interpretation turns into something sweeter than virtue and throws a delightful gleam of love and laughter upon the eccentricities and characteristic follies of individual nature. That he sees everything is one of the conditions of his genial forgiveness of all that is not mean or base or cruel. With these he makes no terms.—Mrs. M. O. W. Oliphant in Century.

Quinine.

"People in using quinine should be careful that they get a good grade of the article or that they are not being fooled altogether. In many cases an inferior product of the cinchona bark, from which quinine is made, is substituted for the real article. It is a little better than the cinchona bark and has not nearly a third of the virtue of quinine. This is called cinchonidia and can be bought for from 2 to 4 cents an ounce, just a little more than the bark itself. It is so good an imitation that the customer is unable to tell the difference except that the results will not be the same. People should be careful to get the pure drug, and the only guarantee they can have is the reputation of the man who sells it to them.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

The Skill and Temper of a Builder.

Queer and racy are the tales told of the skill of the Maine shipbuilders in the use of the adze and broadax. One old time yarn is of a carpenter who applied very drunk at a shipyard for employment. In order to have a little fun with him, the foreman set him to give a proof of his skill by hewing out a wooden bolt with no chopping block but a stone. The carpenter accomplished his difficult task without marring the keen edge of the broadax and showed the foreman a neatly made bolt. Then he brought the ax down with a terrific blow that shattered its edge upon the stone. "I can hew fust rate on your chopping block," he hiccoughed, "but I'il be blamed if I can make the ax stick in it when I git through." The story runs that the foreman lost no time in employing such a workman.—New York Sun.

THE SAN JUAN MINE.

Worked Almost Constantly for Two Centuries.

PREACHING AND PROSPECTING.

That Is What the Mission Fathers Did in Early Days in Mexico.

The conquest of Mexico by Cortez, which began in 1519, nominally for the religious conversion of the heathen Aztecs, was really nothing but a military search for silver and gold and the fabled treasures of the Montezumas.

Immediately after the subjugation of the Indian tribes in 1522 those sturdy old pioneers, the Jesuits, established missions in the mountains, far away from setlementts, but always in some district which bore evidences of being rich in gold and silver. Here they began praying and preaching with zeal, and also began prospecting for silver. All the cactus-tufted mountain sides and the rugged canyons bear the evidences of their search in scattered heaps of stones and abandoned shafts, now almost filled with the rubbish accumulations of the centuries. Valuable ores were found in almost every mountain district, and the silver which they dug made the priesthood of Mexico the richest in the world and their churches the most beautiful. Twenty per cent of the precious metals recovered from the mines in those days was paid as a royalty to the Spanish crown, and in return the Jessuit priests received special privileges, which they used in strengthening their sway over the Indian tribes that inhabited the region. The mines in each district were named after Jesus, the Virgin Mary or some of the saints, and in most cases the names have outlasted even the memory of their early owners.

After the subbjugated Indians had been thoroughly converted he was then enslaved and compelled to toil in the mines. In this way Mexico soon became the greatest silver-producing country in the world, but as a writer of those times has said: "God only knows at what cost of Indian lives it was attained."

The silver lead ores were smelted in galemas or Castalian furnaces, the crumbling ruins of which dot every part of the mining district of Mexico to the present day. They were built entirely of stone, even to the low, shallow oven in which the ores were baked, and the long, narrow flume that conducted water to a crude water-wheel. But the greater part of the most valuable ores found did not contain lead enough to separate the silver from the slag in the furnaces, and the cost of shipping it was so great that for many years it was discarded as wholly valueless.

In 1557 a miner named Medina, living in Pechuca, after experimenting for a long time, discovered a process which could be used in recovering the silver from the ores of this class without the use of lead. Almost at once the Mexican silver industry was revolutionized. Perhaps no Mexican or Spaniard ever contributed a more valuable invention to his country, and his name may stand side by side with that of the inventor of the steam engine. Indeed, modern machinery for the reduction of silver ore is only an improvement in details on Medina's original model. This method, known as the patio process, is still practiced extensively in Mexico, Peru and Chile in all its primitive simplicity. When one takes into consideration the very cheap labor, the almost total absence of fuel and the great scarcity of water in most of the mining districts, one can easily see why it has never been supplanted by the modern machinery used in this country.

Thirty years after the discovery of the patio process Mexico produced about $30,000,000 worth of silver annually.

To comprehead how this immense amount of silver was produced, or a part of it at least, a description of a single Mexican mine locally known as the San Juan (St. John), in the State of Oaxaca, will suffice. This mine has been owned by successive generations of the same family for nearly two centuries and has been worked almost constantly since it was discovered. Occasionally, when a member of the family died or the cuntry was in a state of revolution, the Indians ceased for a few days or a few weeks from running up and down through the gaping mouth of the shaft. It is a three days' journey across a barren waste of desert, over hills and through canyons, from La Puebla on the railroad to the town of San Francisco, which chokes the mouth of a narrow valley between the mountains. Seven miles above, at the center of the little canyon, sleeps in the glaring sunlight El Hacienda de San Juan, the house of the San Juan mine. As if to make room for the village, the canyon widens out around it and forms a beautiful valley in the center of which meanders a little stream, gray with mud from the mines. The village is nothing but a patch of adobe buildings, some of them very old and equally uncomfortable. Visitors are few and far between, and the owner of the mine, who is the chief man of the settlement, always extends a hearty welcome to them.

After a night is spent under his roof a start is made for the mine. Each visitor sits astride a little Mexican burro, or jackass, which crawls slowly but sure-footedly up the mountain side, zig-zagging on a trail cut into the solid porphyritic rock. After reaching an altitude of about 3,000 feet above the hacienda the heaps of rocks about the shaft loom into view and a few minutes later the burros draw up at the side of the yawning pit as if they learned from long experience just where to stop.

After being furnished with candles the party is ready for its exploring trip into the mine. The shaft angles into the mountain side at a dip of about thirty-five degrees for the first sixty feet or more, and then it plunges off into the bowels of the earth, sending off arms here and there in pursuit of some of the ramifications of the vein. The shaft is nowhere very large and at some points only sufficient space exists to allow an Indian with a load on his back to slip through. At the end of the first stretch of the shaft the descent is so steep that it has to be made by the means of Mexican ladders. A Mexican ladder is like no other ladder in the world. It is simply a split log with deep teeth or notches cut in its face, and until a person is accustomed to its use it appears a very feeble means of support. Yet on reaching the top of the first ladder assurance as to its strength is provided by an Indian who appears struggling up with a load of ore on his back. The ore is contained in a rawhide bag borne on his back and fastened by a long strap which passes over his forehead. The weight cannot be less than 100 pounds, and yet the Indian has already borne it up 360 feet of ladders without once resting, and he still has a long distance to go before he reached the top of the shaft. His face and body are dripping with perspiration, and he seems ready to drop with exhaustion, but he knows that the taskmaster will expect him out at a certain time, and so he is compelled to hurry on.

His clothing, as well as that of the other miners, consists solely of a breechclout of coarse cloth and "heractchas" or sandals of rawhide with the hair left on. He and his companions carry out all of the ore and refuse of the mine in this way, and they and their fathers and grandfathers have been doing so for the last 200 years. And so far as the records go there has never yet been a strike.

As soon as the young Indian boys are old enough to climb the ladders they are set to carrying ore, and they keep right at it until they are too old to do the work, and then they are given the lighter task of sorting the ore after it has been brought to the surface.

All they ever earn is 50 cents a day. At the bottom of the mine at the very ends of its numerous ramifications the miners are at work with crude drills and sledges. One of the workers crouches on the floor of the shaft with the drill in his hands and another stoops over and drives it in with short, quick strokes. The work is carried on by the flickering light of a candle stuck to the rocky side of the shaft by means of a handful of mud. The air is damp and heavy and foul, and the heavy silence is broken only by the ring of the sledges on the drills. As soon as the holes are large enough they are loaded with explosives and the fuses set.

When the workmen have all sought safety in some deserted lead the explosion follows and fills the air with more poison than it had before. Then the broken rocks are thrown out and the work of the carriers begins anew.

The ore taken from the San Juan mine is silicious in composition, containing little or no lead, and the silver has to be recovered therefore by the patio process. As soon as the ore is dropped from the sacks of the carriers it is surrounded by a flock of women, children and decrepit men who sort out the refuse and throw it down the mountain side, leaving the good ore in a heap by itself. The sorting goes on from daylight to dark. In the hottest weather the ore-piles present a most picturesque appearance. The women are clad in loose cotton upper garments, glaring red shirts, and blue or green serapas or hoods, and the men and children are almost naked.

After sorting a number of boys take the large pieces and break them up fine, after which they are loaded into native sacks made of lachague, a plant having a coarse, rough fiber. Each sack contains about 250 pounds of ore, enough to make two Indians strain in lifting the load to the back of the little Mexican burro, apparently not much larger than a man. Six or eight burros are started out together in charge of a driver, and they wind round the zig-zag path to the bottom of the mountain. At each of the steep turns the momentum of the load is so great that the burro is compelled to brace himself with both feet to prevent being hurled over the precipice to the rocks below.—Chicago Record.

Air Does Not Kill.

The old belief that projectiles sometimes kill men in battle without hitting them must be abandoned in view of recent scientific experiments. It was formerly supposed that the air compressed and driven before the projectile and technically called "the wind of the shot" was capable of striking a fatal blow, and even army surgeons have assented to this theory.

But experiments have shown that the air driven by a projectile, while capable of being instantaneously photographed in the form of a wave, does not possess sufficient energy to produce any destructive effect.

Another theory which recent investigations have overturned is that the explosive effect sometimes exhibited by bullets is due to compressed air driven into the wound.

Experiment shows that the appearance of explosion arises from the nature of the substance penetrated by the bullet. If this substance is plastic or watery, the impulse of the projectile is distributed laterally in all directions among its particles, and they are driven asunder.

Such an effect has been noticed in battle when bullets have entered the brain, and accusations of using explosive projectiles, contrary to the comity of nations, have been based upon them. By firing bullets into wet dough every indication of an explosion has been produced, although the same bullets, fired with identical velocity, into solid substances, like bone, made only round, clean cut holes.—Youth's Companion.

SAVED BY BIRDS.

A Boy's Wish for a Partridge Gratified.

A GIRL IS RESCUED BY A PLOVER.

Her Prayer That a Bird Might be Sent to Show Her the Way Home Answered.

Edgar, the youngest son of James Keener, of Claiborne parish, had been very ill or several weeks, so ill, in fact, that the little fellow's life was despaired of, when a singular occurrence, in which a quail played a conspicuous part, turned the tide in his favor. The boy had made a brave struggle with death, but the slow, wasting fever had almost exhausted his powers of endurance, and even his appetite had left him. The mother and father used every means in their possession to tempt him to eat, but in vain, and the only nourishment he received had to be forced upon him. Finally, one morning, when, to the grief-stricken parents, the end seemed near at hand, Edgar asked if he might have a broiled partridge. Quail are very plentiful in Louisiana, and Mr. Keener set out gladly with his gun, never doubting that he would kill one for his son. He searched the fields and adjoining woods eagerly, but in vain. At last he stopped all the hands on the place and sent them in every direction, scouring the whole neighborhood, but not a bird was started.

Late in the afternoon, leaving the men still hunting, he went home, sorrowful, fearing his child might have grown worse from disappointment. By and by Mrs. Keener came and called him softly, and following her into the sick room what was his amazement to see sitting on the footboard of Edgar's bed a round, plump partridge. They shut the doors and windows, captured the bird, and Edgar was soon smacking his feeble lips over the broiled brown breast. The little fellow began to improve from that moment, and still lives to tell the story of the bird that, as he says, "saved his life."

Mary, the small daughter of L. C. Hewett, a cattle dealer of Bell county, Texas, having gone with her parents and a party of friends on a picnic excursion to one of the neighboring mountain peaks, got lost in playing about by herself, being the only child in the crowd. Mrs. Hewett, being busily engaged with her friends, had suffered little Mary to wander about at her own sweet will, and ere long the unsuspecting child had climbed with her nimble young feet quite to the summit of the mountain. Like all the outcroppings of the region this peak is composed of the rocks and fossils belonging to the cretacean period, so that no tracks might be left in the shaly soil. Besides, the mountain is literally enwrapt by a dense growth of scrubby, low-growing cedars, making an almost impenetrable thicket. When little Mary discovered that she was alone on the mountain-top, she did just what any child would do under the circumstances, that is she began to call her mother. But a strong west wind carried her voice away, and no answer came from below.

Meanwhile, she had set about trying to find the way by which she had come up, and when not a trace of her little footsteps was to be seen she began to cry. Now, Mary was a good little Sunday-school girl, and as she sat there desolate and alone on the mountain she remembered some of the sweet truths she had heard of One who is ever ready to help those that are lost, so what did she do but put up a prayer in her little baby way that He might help her. As she prayed, she wondered in her innocence how anything big could make its way through all those sprawling, scraggy cedars, so she asked that a little bird might be sent to guide her.

The words had scarce left her lips when she saw a plover flitting about in the cedar below her feet. Overjoyed at the sight, the child at once began to scramble down, the bird leading the way over rocks and cedar-brush. It was a long and a toilsome descent, with her little feet slipping and stumbling over the loose stones, but the bird flitted back and forth before her and she did not despair.

By and by the journey came to an end, however. Mary heard voices and presently caught sight of her friends, who had just become aware of her absence. She ran to them joyfully, telling of the bird that had brought her safely down the mountain, and as they looked they saw a plover mount high in air, winging its way eastward.

A curious circumstance of a bird's kindly assistance is thus related by Miss Alice Moreland, of Tennessee, who, for the benefit of her health, spent the spring of '94 at Lampassas Springs, Texas. Miss Moreland says: "Toward nightfall of an exceedingly sultry April day, a fierce wind came sweeping down the mountains, bringing what is termed in Texas a 'wet norther.' The wind whistled and shrieked and howled, shaking the house with its force, and the rain came down in perfect torrents.

"I was in my room alone, trying to write some letters which it was necessary for me to get off in next morning's mail, but I was constantly interrupted by horrid little caterpillars which came crawling under my door or between the window sashes where they were imperfectly joined' These disgusting little pests had made my life a misery to me ever since spring opened, and really I began to feel that the whole great State of Texas was alive with them.

"They seemed to be in the heavens above as well as the earth below, for they fairly rained down upon you if you passed under a tree, and crawled up your skirts from the grass. There were all sorts and all shapes and all sizes of them, green ones and yellow ones, black ones and variegated ones. Of course, I was afraid of them. What self-respecting woman isn't afraid of a thing that creeps?

"And I don't think anyone, even a man, would find it altogether pleasant to see a little ridgey-backed caterpillar peeping over the edge of his plate at the table, or looking one-sided at him from a comfortable chair on the verandah. My chief occupation after their advent was in keeping them out of my room, and this I succeeded in doing only by untiring effort and closing every door and window. But this night that I speak of even this device failed, as the storm actually stripped them from the trees and vines outside, and they came in little exploring parties under the door, as I said, seeking shelter.

"Now everybody more or less has seen caterpillars, but I think no one who has not visited Texas has a speaking acquaintance with the long hairy variety that sometimes infests that unfortunate region. I know, at least, I never saw one before, and I was horror-struck at the sight of them, but consumed with dread when the 'natives' told me that every hair on their bristling bodies was a sting like that of a hornet, which positively burnt them a pathway over the human body should they by chance elect to journey over it.

"Do you wonder then that I relished seeing one of these bristly fellows perched atop of my paper-weight, or crawling up the leg of my table? You may imagine that, with the storm raging without, and the caterpillars within, my nerves were in a very shaky condition, to say the least, so I was not a little startled in the midst of it all to hear a quick tapping on the transom above my door. I looked to behold 'darkness there and nothing more.' Again the tapping, and this time a vivid flash of lighning showed me a bird fluttering against the pane, and tapping with his beak.

'Come in, poor storm-tossed little one,' I said, opening the door, and there flew in a bird, one of the great sparrow family, who perched himself upon the broad picture moulding which ran around my room. He seemed quite content to remain there, and as the storm had lulled somewhat and the caterpillars were, apparently, put to rout by my frequent and frantic attacks upon them with a broom, I felt more comfortable myself, and soon finished my writing.

"When I was ready to retire, and just as I was about to blow out the light, preparatory to getting in bed, my little feathered guest began to flit around overhead, and by and by dipped down before my very face and caught in his bill a great yellow hairy caterpillar which was quietly reposing on the pillow where, in a moment later, I would have placed my head only to feel his innumerable bristles sting their way into my flesh. I exhausted every effort to discover if, perhaps, another one lay in some unsuspected ambush, but in vain, the little bird had proven an efficient protector."—Philadelphia Times.

WHY DON'T THEY MARRY?

The operations of the marriage license bureau in San Francisco show that though the population is increasing the number of marriages is decreasing. In 1893 the number of marriage licenses issued was 3,295; in 1894 it was only 3,112, the decrease being about 6 per cent. It has been a steady decline from month to month, with no change, in the last two years. No other cause being apparent, the falling off in the matrimonial business is ascribed to the hard times and is regarded as a confirmation of Buckle's theory that the marriage rate fluctuates with the price of wheat. A similar decline in matrimony has been observed at the East.

Long before the present stagnation in business was observed statistics showed that the marriage rate was declining in civilized countries, and philosophers were puzzled to account for the fact. By some it was argued that the hyper refinement of the period was making many men and women too critical in their tastes for the experiment of matrimony. It was shown that modern improvements, especially in the direction of club life, were enabling bachelors to enjoy the comforts and luxuries of existence without the burden and responsibility of a wife, while the throwing open of avenues of employment for women was developing their independence and creating in them a repungance to a marriage which did not realize their ideal. It was observed that men who once adopted a club life became wedded to it and rarely exchanged it for a dual existence. Whether these influences were as potent as social philosophers have imagined or not it seems to be certain that the cold wave of hard times struck possible candidates for matrimony just as they were questioning its merits on general principles. Young men who were doubtful about marriage when the financial question did not enter into their thoughts were swayed to the negative side when it loomed up as a factor in the case. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the development of culture is rendering women more attractive than they ever were and men more capable of appreciating them. Similarly, the young men of the day are better fitted to command the love of good women than the young men of a generation ago and are less prone to gross and coarse forms of vice.

CHARACTER IN FEET.

Like the Fancies of an Opulent Imagination.

A NEWLY-DISCOVERED SCIENCE.

The Size and Shape of Head Once Offered a Clew to Our Normal Disposition.

An expert chiromancer, tired of reading character by the inspection of hands, has discovered that fortunes may be told by a careful observation of the feet. The latter are not as wrinkled as the hands; fewer lines can be traced and baptised to bear such names as Line of Life and Line of Love; still, even in the plumpest foot there are mounts and vales which to the erudite eye may have a signification. Until the new science was discovered critics of the foot were content to be sarcastic over splay feet or pigeon toes; a foot that was stubby was supposed to indicate a plebian origin, while a long and narrow foot with an arched instep was proof incontestable of aristocratic blood. Common people, unobservant of the laws of proportion, often sneer at a large foot, forgetting that its size must correspond with the burden it has to bear; just as other ignoramuses chant ditties to small feet, ignoring the well known law that in the human race the intellect may be measured by the understanding. In women it occurs that habit stamps an impress on the shape of the foot. It is easy to understand that a foot in which the small toe is pushed under or over the next toe must belong to a vain girl, and indicates vanity in disposition. But other rules are not so easy of comprehension. For instance, we are told that where the little toe hides its head under the third toe, its owner is prudent; when one of the toenails is invisible, its owner is cautious. Where the second toe is humped above the rest, its owner will be domestic in her habits. Where the toes are elastic and cling closely together when the foot is firmly pressed on the floor, the artistic temperament is indicated. Where the hollow of the foot rises so high that the hand can be slipped under it, the foot belongs to a high-tempered person, high strung and fond of society; a high instep generally indicates fondness for dress.

A person in whose foot the cords are distinctly defined and prominent is apt to possess determination and a capacity to carry her point. When the ankle is large and the heel narrow, it is safe to assert that the owner is brave and resolute, the kind of girl who picks out her man and marries him, willy nilly. There is comfort in the new science for ladies who have complained that they have ugly feet. A long, broad and flat foot indicates resource and fertility in expedient, and a short, thick, stubby foot reveals a clinging and affectionate nature. So there is consolation for wearers of all kinds of feet. A high sense of propriety, verging on prudishness, indicated by a spreading heel. The true way to examine a foot is when it is suspended in air, with no weight to maintain. If then it is so well knit and firm that it shows little change in form, the wearer is sure to be a coquette who is capable of an intense affection.

All this sounds like the fancies of an opulent imagination. The rules herein laid down certainly do not seem to rest on a scientific basis. Still they are probably as trustworthy as the laws of chiromancy, which young ladies study so intently, and which they practice on their admirers, who are only too well pleased to have their great paws handled by the slim, cool fingers of a laughing girl. After all, what do we know about the laws of nature? For aught we can tell, the Creator may have written our characters in the shape of our feet as he proportions our animal vigor to the size of our noses.

Phrenology and the law of physiognomy are embryo sciences which may be some day understood. Thirty or forty years ago everybody went mad over phrenology and careful parents chose vocations for their children from the bumps on their cranium. We now know that Fowler was a humbug. But there is no doubt the size and shape of the brain afford a clew to the normal disposition. As to the science of physiognomy, that is a study which will presently be developed with astonishing results. Every man's instincts are wirtten on his features and can be read like an open book by those who possess the secret of interpreting the lines of the face. It is no more possible for a man to hide his normal instincts as depicted in his eyes, nose and mouth than it is for him to disguise his handwriting; but few of us have been sufficiently educated to read the picture aright. By and by we shall do so; and then perhaps we may supplement our study of the face by our examination of the hands and feet to see if their revelations correspond.—S. F. Bulle in.

In a Big Maple Sugar Grove.

In the best Fletcher groves of today a long pipe or trough line runs from some central spot in the grove down to the big storage tanks in the sugar house. Here the perfected evaporator, when under full headway, will convert the first sap into sirup in half an hour, consuming about one cord of wood to produce 100 pounds of sugar. There are in the town of Fletcher, at a moderate estimate, 30,000 trees, this being probably within the real number.

LOCAL ITEMS FROM THE SOUTH.

Keeler Cal. April 4, 1895.

Mr. C. A Johnson passed through Keeler Wednesday on his way to Mazourka. He has been at Montgomery district for the past three or four months packing wood for the mines there but has sold his mules and packing outfit, as the Company has decided to use gasoline in future. He says that the property is now owned by a company and is paying well. He reports times good at both Del Mar and Montgomery camps, both being gold camps.

Sam Thomas brought in a load of ore from the Fitzgerald mine Wednesday and says things are looking fine at Modock. There are two or three carloads of good ore ready to be shipped. Arcularius will begin hauling two or three car loads from the Lane mine at Darwin next week.

The Mojave and Keeler stage line has a new time card, which took effect Monday night at eight oclock. Stages now arrive at Keeler on Monday and Thursday mornings and leave Keeler for Mojave on Monday and Friday at eight in the evening, making a daylight run through the Red Rock Canyon, which has here to fore only been enjoyed by moonlight.

Henry Mettler of Darwin drove in from there with a load of passengers among them being D. C. Lane, bound for Pomona and Los Angeles. Henry talks of starting a creamery at Darwin as they have milk now to throw to the birds.

John Le Moigne came in from his mammoth lead mine Sunday, and says he will never be satisfied until he gets at least three or four large teams at work hauling ore from his mine for shipment, and he talks some of putting up a forty or fifty ton smelter at or near Keeler.

It is reported that parties at Darwin are surveying and making preparations with a view of fixing up the old stage road from there to Mojave and shipping ore to the smelters at Pueblo and Denver Colorado. They claim that they will be able to get better returns from their lead ores, as working charges cut a high figure, there being no competition for smelting on this coast.

Postmaster Fiehman made a flying business trip to Independence on Tuesday, returning on horse back from there on Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. A Cohn passed through Keeler on his way to Los Angeles and Bakersfield, by last stage.

E. S. Reddy, has left Darwin, and gone to pastures new. He went to the Silver Star district near Soda Springs on Tuesday's train, and will try his fortunes in the new gold camp. Ed has done good work at Darwin and is rated as a good assayer and all around mining man.

It is reported that a party from Hawthorne named Stewart has struck it very rich in his claim at Soda Springs, one specimen was taken out a few days ago, which was the richest and prettiest ever seen in the new district, and was valued at over one hundred dollars, and plenty more of the same kind in sight. Silver Star seems to be the coming camp.

Conductor A. Y. Gale, had the misfortune to meet with an accident while coupling cars at Keeler Wednesday evening, the middle finger of the right hand was thought to be broken at first, but upon examination by Dr. Dorrance it was found to be only bruised. It was very painful and taken altogether was a very close call for Conductor Gale. Accidents of this kind will not be so liable to occur when the Patent Automatic Car coupler law goes into effect on January first 1898.

J. J. Stewart made a flying trip to this end of the County Tuesday. J. G. Dodge also drove down Monday returning the same day. J. V. Hunter's smiling countenance was also observed in this section last Saturday, also F. McIver of Georges Creek and C. W. Craig of Independence.

Dr. C. E. Dorrence of Bishop was a visitor at Keeler Wednesday evening and went to Lone Pine Thursday morning, intending to go from there via Independence to Bishop by private conveyance.

Unknown parties supposed to be either Chinese or Indians, having lately been making a habit of taking or appropriating to their own use, car stakes from the wood and lumber cars, at Keeler station, one or two stakes being missed from a car every week or ten days, this is bad business and the Railroad agent at that station has posted a notice offering a reward of twenty five dollars for the arrest and conviction of the guilty parties.

Miss Helen Gunn is visiting here this week and is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. D. Holland.

The Reaper Gathers Another.

J. J. Moore died at his residence in Independence yesterday about 1 o'clock. He was taken suddenly ill early Wednesday morning and about 9 o'clock became unconscious and his condition did not change until the end. It is safe to say that Jack Moore was the best known man in Inyo County. He was one of the early pioneers, and his simple kindness of heart endeared him to all the old-timers. He had repeatedly held positions of trust and honor in the management of County affairs, being Under Sheriff a number of times, and was twice elected County Treasurer. At the time of his death he was Postmaster at Independence. All his life he bore a most enviable reputation for honor and integrity, and there is not a person in the whole county who will not have a kind remembrance of "Jack." He leaves a widow and four children to mourn the death of a good husband and kind, indulgent father. The funeral will take place to-morrow at one o'clock, under the auspices of Inyo Lodge No. 221, F. & A. M., of which deceased was a valued member.

To whom It May Concern.

Notice is hereby given that I will not be responsible for any debts contracted by my son Albert Aguirre, a minor. And all parties are notified not to give him credit on my account.

What Aluminium Is.

There are many misconceptions about aluminium that are widespread and which it seems difficult to correct in the public mind. Aluminium is not, section for section, a very strong metal. It is only one-half as strong as wrought iron. It has a very low elastic limit. It is not rigid, but bends under a transverse strain readily. It is in its alloys that its utility commences to appear. With 8 to 12 per cent of copper or aluminium bronze we have one of the most dense, finest grained and strongest metals known.—New York Telegram.

KING RHEUMATISM.

HIS REIGN IS OVER AT LAST.

Medical Science Drives Him From His Throne. A Medicine Discovered that Rheumatism Cannot Resist. A Boon for Sufferers.

(From the St. Louis, Mo., Chronicle.)

The effect of using Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for rheumatism was brought to light lately by a Chronicle reporter who interviewed John Ferguson of 7039 South Broadway, St. Louis, who had been a sufferer with this incapacitating disease.

"Those pills," he said, "have proved of great benefit not only to me, but to my wife. Strange to say, we both suffered from the same ailment, although my wife's condition was much worse than mine. Neither of us could sleep at night; we had sharp, shooting pains in our arms, sides and limbs, and a continual soreness all over the body. What we suffered from was nothing more or less than rheumatism. At times my wife had to crawl up stairs on her hands and knees, and as for me, I would at night twitch and jerk despite my utmost efforts to control myself. We suffered the torture of the damned.

"But in three weeks the pain began to leave us. My case not being as severe as my wife's I soon got well, but it took nearly three months before Mrs. Ferguson could say she was entirely free from rheumatic pains. Of course, I recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to all my friends."

Mr. Ferguson's words are indorsed by T. A. Campbell, an iron worker living on Chouteau avenue. He, too, had been afflicted with rheumatism contracted from working in a damp foundry. He said: "One day I was seized with chills and my doctor ordered me to remain in bed for at least several days. I began to lose my previously good appetite, a depression of spirits, lack of ambition, a tired feeling and even loss of memory followed. I couldn't keep my feet warm, and my usual ruddy complexion had given way to a sallow hue.

"With my family to support, I couldn't afford to be idle. I struggled against my feelings as best I could, but the best I could do, even with the doctor's help, was very little.

"Hearing of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills I determined to try them. The effects were nothing short of marvelous. They made me well, and as a preventative, I take them regularly. They're the best medicine I know of, and as such my friends hear me speak of them."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effects of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, and all forms of weakness, either in male or female. They may be had of all druggists, or direct from the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y., for 50c. per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

The Claim on Deer Creek.

By A. H. GIBSON.

"I would ef I hed ther money. I know yer hev plenty o' cash, after stoppin' thet train over in Missoury," and Hines chuckled gleefully, "an' kin pay down ther fee required by ther land agent."

"Waal, I am better heeled than afore I boarded thet train," replied Finley, "an' I'm willin' ter go cohoots on ther claim with yer, Dick. When do yer want ter git ther contract?"

"I thought we could start in ther mornin' afore daylight an' ride ter Baxter," returned Hines. "Yer see, if we uns gits er airly start nobody in ther neighborhood will see us, an' so we uns will not be suspicioned of goin' ter ther land office. Yer know ther league has spies out."

Then the plotters mounted their ponies, which had been permitted to crop the grass along the margin of the stream, and rode off, chuckling with much self satisfaction over the cleverness of their scheme to gain possession of Adam Hamlet's claim.

The girl, nearly petrified with fright over the underhand plot to which she had listened, and which, if carried out according to the villains' plans, would rob her and her father of a home where they had been faithfully toiling all summer, waited until the deepening shades of evening hid the horsemen from view, then leaving the cow to find her own way back, she sped up the creek toward the dugout.

She found her father, pale, thin and weak, sitting in the door, where the cool breath of evening fanned his feverish brow. He looked so ghostlike, so powerless to contend with human affairs, as he half reclined there in the starlight, that Nancy hesitated to tell him what she had overheard down in the wild plum thicket. But it was right that he should be forewarned, and she must break it to him as gently as she could.

"Wher' yer been, Nancy?" he asked feebly, as she threw herself on the bench near him.

"Jest down ther creek," she answered, her voice trembling.

"Yer act scart, Nancy, as ef yer'd been a-runnin'," her father remarked, noticing the girl's strange agitation.

"Well, pap, I did see two big varmints down on the corner o' ther claim," she returned, trying to laugh.

"Two big varmints! Wolves?"

"Yes, or leastwise wolves thet hes two feet an' wears trousers—human wolves, wot's er heap more dangerouser than ther four footed kind."

"Wot do yer mean, Nancy?" Hamlet asked, mystified.

"I seed Dick Hines an' one o' his gang down thar."

"Dick Hines! On my claim? Wot was he doin' thar?"

"Plottin' ter git er contract fur our claim an' then run us out," and with that introductory explanation she gave her father a clear account of the villain's scheme as she had overheard it.

"Wot kin we do?" he appealed to the girl in his helpless weakness. "I reckon he'll beat us outen ther claim yit," and the sick man became overwrought with dejection.

"No he won't, pap," and Nancy set her mouth resolutely as she asked herself what she could do to outwit their enemy. She would not show despair now before her feeble father.

"Ef Tom Byers was only home he might stop Hines," said the troubled settler.

Nancy's face flushed at the mention of that name, and she did not immediately make answer.

"It's awful ter be so no-account as I am," the sick man wailed. "I'm so weak I couldn't take my part agin a crawfish now; an' thar's no use 'pealin' ter ther neighbors, fur ther kinder down on me 'cause I've refused ter become er member o' ther league. Hines is plumb shore ter git ther claim," he reiterated, his old spirit all crushed by disease.

"No, Hines won't!" and the girl sprang to her feet, her eyes flashing with the fires of a sudden resolve. "I'll stop him myself."

"Yer, Nancy?"

"Yes, pap."

"How'll yer do it?"

"I'll git on ther pony, ride over ter Baxter, an' tell ther land agent all erbout ther claim," returned Nancy.

"Hines 'll beat yer ther."

"No, he won't, pap, fur I'm aimin' ter start ternight an' git ahead o' him."

"Yer sha'n't go, Nancy!"

"But, pap, I must. Yer not able, but I am. Ain't I been actin' yer boy, an' tendin' ter ther stock," she reasoned playfully, "an' wot's ter hinder me frum goin'?"

"It's so fur, child, nigh onter twenty-two miles, an' over sich wild puraries. But ther night's ther biggest objection."

"It's er heap cooler ridin' at night," she argued. "Say yes, pap, fur I'm bound ter go. Jest think! Our home's at stake, and ef thet wolf's ter be relied on erbout thar bein' coal veins along ther creek, our claim's mighty valyble. I'm goin' ter save it."

"But yer kain't git ther contract without my presence, Nancy," Hamlet said despondently. "I know thet p'int o' ther land law."

"No, pap, but I kin see ther land agent an' tell him erbout Hines. An' ef yer willin' I kin take ther money yer've been savin' ter build er house an' pay down on ther claim. Then we'll shore be ahead o' ole Hines."

Hamlet saw it would be utterly useless for him to raise any more objections. Nancy was determined to go to Baxter that night to outwit Dick Hines, and it would require more than his spent strength to induce her to give up the mission.

About eleven o'clock the brave girl mounted her pony and rode away from the dugout. Knotted in one corner of a handkerchief were two hundred dollars, which Hamlet had given her to pay down on the claim. That represented his entire cash account, and had been saved for another purpose that fall, but he yielded it up gladly to Nancy's care, believing with her that it would be better invested in securing a contract for the land.

She would have to ride about eight miles across the unbroken prairie before she reached the "Old Mission" road, as it was called. That gained, she would have a straight, well traveled way to Baxter Springs, near the southern border of the county.

The tract of land known as the Neutral Lands comprised about eight hundred thousand acres of fertile prairie, located in the southeastern part of the state.

It had been owned by the Cherokee Indians, who had ceded it in trust to the United States about the close of the war of secession. The secretary of the interior was the agent of the Indians to sell the land.

After considerable wrangling over the disposal of the land in parcels, as the agent had been authorized to do, the entire body was purchased by James F. Joy, of Michigan, who became owner of the Neutral Lands soon after the arrival of the Hamlet family, in 1868.

The families or settlers who had been located on the Neutral Lands before Joy had purchased them declared the whole business to be a vast swindle, they maintaining a perfect right to take claims there under the pre-emption or homestead acts.

Excitement ran high on those wild prairies, and the anti-Joy settlers organized leagues, and pledged themselves to resist the claims of the purchaser to the death if it became necessary.

The settlers were deceived by the false rumors of evil agitators, who had nothing to do but ride from one cabin to another, keeping strife so stirred up that the true situation of the matter was veiled from their understanding.

A league was formed near Hamlet's claim, and though he had been invited and even urged to join it he took a position of neutrality. He had faith that congress would adjust the trouble satisfactorily, and went on making such rude improvements as he was able on his quarter section, content to await the final decision of that body.

Nancy Hamlet urged her pony forward across the lonely prairie. There was no moon, but the bright stars which shone in the dark blue vault above her enabled her to keep the proper course.

Alone in the deep darkness of midnight, out on the prairie, the girl's heart felt a sense of desolation and awe that was almost past enduring. Silence brooded somberly everywhere, broken occasionally when her pony frightened up some bird that had been passing the night in the rank grass.

Gaining the main traveled road leading to Baxter the girl felt a revival of courage. Speaking more hopefully to her animal she galloped away, as if freshly animated for her mission.

It was a thinly settled region she was passing through, and only a lonely cabin, where all was silent as the grave, every two or three miles apart, rose dimly before her view.

She neared the small town of Baxter Springs just as the eastern horizon toward the dark woods along Spring river began to grow crimson with the first flush of dawn.

In the outskirts of the place she was halted by a military guard, who regarded the girl suspiciously.

A sub-officer was called, who, on learning the dauntless Nancy's errand, courteously conducted her himself to the boarding house where the agent for the Neutral Lands had rooms.

He was hastily aroused from his morning nap, and presently appeared in the little sitting room where Nancy Hamlet awaited him.

After she had confided in him as much of their trouble with Hines as she cared to, and told her business in coming at such an unusually early hour, the agent said:

"Well, Miss Hamlet, I must say you have acted bravely in outwitting a villain, and you and your father have my true sympathy in your troubles. Of course, as you are aware, your father's presence will be necessary to make the contract valid. But you may leave a payment on the claim in my hands, for which I will write you out a receipt, and your father can come in when he is able to make the trip, and we'll fix up his legal title to the land."

Thanking the agent for his kindness, and taking the receipt which he made out for her, Nancy mounted her pony and started homeward, her heart in a wild tumult of ecstasy over the success she had achieved in defeating a bad man.

The sun was just peeping above the hills, burnishing the tree tops with lucid amber, as she rode out of Baxter.

There was a warm tint on her oval cheeks, her hazel eyes had the brightness of triumph in them, while the breeze from the southwest played strange havoc with the unconfined dark locks of the brave prairie maiden. She was a picture of girlish beauty and modest heroism.

She had not left the town more than two miles behind her when, on entering a wood lining a stream, she came face to face with Dick Hines and his brutal faced ally.

Her presence so far from home, so near Baxter, made Hines suspect the truth at once. His face darkened savagely, and fixing her with his hawkish eyes, while an ugly imprecation fell from his lips, he sought to block her passage.

The road had been washed deep by hard rains, with high, steep banks on either side, so Nancy had no choice but to draw her pony aside to let the men pass. But instead of going on, Hines and his companion halted directly before her, and with a leer in his face the leader said:

"Wher yer been so airly, gal?"

"Tendin' ter my own business, Dick Hines!" she replied with spirit.

"Wot's thet paper yer got in yer hand?" Hines demanded, catching sight of the folded receipt which she held as too precious to let out of her sight.

"Thet's my father's. Let me pass."

"Not so fast, gal! Yer been ter Baxter ter the land agent, an' thet paper hes somethin' ter say erbout wot yer been doin' thar. I'm goin' ter see thet paper," he asserted with a loud oath.

"No, yer not," the girl cried, trying to force her pony past the villain. But he grasped her bridle rein and restrained her.

"Finley, yer kin take the paper frum her while I hold ther pony," said Hines, with malignant exultation beaming in every feature of his countenance.

Finley rode toward the girl's side to do his leader's bidding, but instantly she transferred the receipt to her mouth and shut her teeth tight together.

"Choke ther durned hussy!" roared Hines, and again Finley approached her, an evil glitter in his green eyes.

At that moment there was the hurried clatter of hoofs over the stony road leading toward the little ford where Nancy Hamlet had been stopped by the two scoundrels, and a clear voice that sent the red blood flowing back into the girl's fear blanched cheeks rang out sharply on the pure morning air:

"Lay one finger on that girl at yer peril!" and Tom Byers, with flashing eyes, covered the villains with his six shooter.

With muttered curses the baffled wretches fell back in surprise and confusion.

"Now ride, whelps!" he ordered, following them with the weapon. "An' keep on ridin' till yer git cl'ar out o' God's country. Don't let me ketch yer back on Deer creek or ther Neosho river pollutin' ther air with yer rotten devilmint, or I'll shoot yer down like two ornery dogs."

They knew there was no jesting in that tone, and they rode off, with rage in their dark hearts, but daring not to utter a word, in the direction of the Indian Territory border.

"Oh, Tom!" cried Nancy, recovering her speech as the defeated villains disappeared beyond a hill, "how did yer ever happen erlong jest when yer did?"

"I come up from ther Injun nation last night," he answered, riding up to her side. "I was on my way back ter ther ranch, but decided ter stay all night in Baxter. I was at ther very hotel where ther land agent stays. Yer was jest ridin' ont o' town as I got up. I'm well acquainted with ther agent, an' he told me how yer'd happened ter be in Baxter. When he told me what yer'd overheard Hines an' Finley plannin' ter do I was afeard yer'd meet ther whelps an' hev trouble. So I ordered my horse and rid right after yer."

"I don't know what I'd done ef yer hedn't rid up," said the girl, trying to meet the admiring eyes of Tom Byers.

"Nannie, yer a mighty brave girl," he said, trying to possess himself of her hand, "but yer need some big, honest feller who thinks a heap of yer ter take keer of yer. I was thinkin' o' sellin' out my ranch an' goin' back ter mother, but if I could only persuade yer to bide long with me thar on ther Neosho I'd be plumb contented ter live allus out hyer on ther Neutral Lands."

"Oh, Tom!" she said, quickly withdrawing her hand, "pap's ailin' consid'ble, an' I must git back ter him."

"I'll ride back with yer, Nannie," Tom declared, and they left the ford at once.

It was a very pleasant and satisfactory ride to Tom Byers, judging from the glad light that shone in his blue eyes as the young couple rode up to the dugout and were greeted by Adam Hamlet.

"Tom, I'm mighty glad ter hev yer bring my leetle gal safe home. Is all well?"

"All's well," answered Tom, warmly shaking the settler's hand. "Ther claim's yer'n, an' Nannie's mine!"

The land question was finally decided in the courts, and new settlers began to flock into the country. The league excitement subsided, and many of its warmest adherents contracted with Joy for their lands.

Tom Byers' threats evidently had the desired effect on Dick Hines, for soon after the encounter at the ford he and his gang left the country for parts unknown. Their places were taken by honest settlers. Consequently no regrets followed them, except that some of them had escaped their just deserts at the hands of the law.

Adam Hamlet secured a legal title to his claim, and in due time developed valuable coal mines along the creek.

Tom and Nancy have a comfortable home near the Neosho river, and are as happy as a well mated couple can be who possess one hundred and sixty acres of rich land under good cultivation and clear of all incumbrance.

THE END.

Take Care of the Harness.

Whether a harness is in good condition after six or eight years of hard service, or is good for nothing after two years, depends on the care taken of it. If well oiled and cleaned after every exposure to storms, the harness lasts until enough is made out of it to buy another. It is a good plan to keep two harnesses, one for fine weather and the other for use when it is wet and rough. We saw only a few days ago a harness that its owner assured us had been used for best during eighteen years, and it was still in good condition. In that time many farmers would be obliged to buy two if not three harnesses. It is possibly in facts like this that some farmers may find abundant reason for their complaint that farming does not pay.—American Cultivator.

A Surprise.

After the morning sermon I gave the "Notices," and then announced the number of the hymn to be sung. The congregation had opened their hymn books. Seeing one of the deacons coming toward the pulpit I waited with open book. He reminded me that I had forgotten to give a notice of the ladies' meeting. I then stated to the congregation that I had forgotten to give such notice, announced the number of the hymn again and proceeded to read it. The feeling of the congregation—not to say my own—may be imagined when I read the first line of the hymn:

Lord, what a thoughtless wretch was I!

—Homiletic Review.

A Modern Evil.

"Here is another blow at the institution of matrimony," said a cross looking man the other day as he ran his eye over the advertisements in the daily paper.

"What is it?" asked a curious bystander.

"A furnishing store which sells all sorts of gentlemen's clothing with a guarantee that it is to be kept in order for a whole year. It was bad enough when The Adversary put it into the head of some one to start a 'chaperon bureau.' Modern inventions are making the sexes entirely too independent of each other. I don't approve of it at all."—Kate Field's Washington.

Dodged the Doctor.

Many years ago there lived in the north of England a man notorious for his wealth, his extreme parsimony and the great difficulty which people found in collecting their bills from him. One day his wife fell sick. After delaying the matter as long as he could he was obliged to call on a physician. "Will you ever pay me?" said the doctor. "I will give you my note," said the man, "and, furthermore," said he, "I will make the note payable 'kill or cure.'" The lady died. The note became due, overdue, and after many months of patient waiting the doctor brought suit. The justice scanned the note, found it exact and perfect in detail and asked the defendant if he knew of any reason why judgment should not be rendered against him. The old man arose and said that he had no attorney to represent him for the reason that he did not think it necessary; that he only wanted to ask the plaintiff two questions. The court agreeing, he said to the doctor, "Did you cure my wife?" "No," said the doctor. "That was impossible." "Did you kill her?"—Cyclopedia of Anecdotes.

The Traveling Crane.

Among the improvements lately introduced into great iron works are electric cranes. The structures are made with heavy iron poles in trestlework fashion and support tramways, upon which these immense cranes travel. For carrying the heavy products of the mills this form of transportation has points of advantage over all others. The lines from the various mills lead to a general storage point and make shipping much more convenient and expeditious.—New York Ledger.

A frying pan with legs about 6 inches long is among the curios recovered at Herculaneum. It belonged to Docilla, who had scratched her name on the handle.

THE WRONG WAY.

There is a way of looking at a thing that is curious and wrong. The old adage, "proof of the pudding is in eating it," is sound sense. And another "never condemn before trial." In the treatment of anything, treat it in good faith, so when infirmities beset us, beset them with good will and force. Thousands have in this way overcome the worst forms of rheumatism by using St. Jacobs Oil. Never shrink from what is known to be by thousands a positive cure for this dread complaint, and that is the thing to remove the trouble and solve the doubt.

Umbrellas made of varnished paper are coming into favor in France.

$100 REWARD, $100.

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Which Purifies, Vitalizes and Enriches the Blood.

At this season everyone should take a good spring medicine. Your blood must be purified or you will be neglecting your health. There is a cry from Nature for help, and unless there is prompt and satisfactory response you will be liable to serious illness.

This demand can only be met by the purifying, enriching and elements to be found in Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"My mother-in-law, Mrs. Elizabeth Wolfe, at the age of 72 years, was attacked with a violent form of salt rheum; it spread all over her body, and her hands and limbs were dreadful to look at. At the same time, my little daughter Clara, who was just one year old, was attacked by a similar disease, like scrofula. It appeared in under each side of her neck; had the attendance of the family physician and other doctors for a long time, but seemed to grow worse. I read of many people cured of scrofula by Hood's Sarsaparilla. As soon as we gave Hood's Sarsaparilla to Clara, she began to get better, and before the first bottle was gone, the sores entirely healed up and there has never been any sign of the disease since. She is a Healthy Robust Child.

Her grandmother took Hood's Sarsaparilla at the same time, and the salt rheum decreased in its violence and a perfect cure was soon effected. It took about three months for her cure, and she ascribes her good health and strength at her advanced age to Hood's Sarsaparilla. It has certainly been a Godsend to my family." MRS. SOPHIA WOLFE, Zaleski, Ohio.

THE BEST TEACHER.

The Arabs say that the best Teacher is Time. That is true, especially when year after year enforces the same lesson. For more than thirty years ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS have been in use in every part of the world, and the testimony is universal as to their value as an external remedy for pains of every kind in the back, chest and side. Some people have learned the lesson so well that they try to imitate them, and the result is a host of counterfeits, all pretending to be just as good as ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, and unconscious that by this very statement they acknowledge that ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS hold the first place. Be sure and get the genuine.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS always act uniformly.

England has forty ships engaged in South African traffic, Germany eight, and the United States only two.

AN EAGER AND A NIPPING WIND,

A continuous down pour of rain, inclement weather, generally in winter and spring, are unfavorable to all classes of invalids. But warmth and activity infused into the circulation counteracts these influences and interposes a defense against them. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, most thorough and effective of stomachics and tonics, not only enriches the blood, but accelerates its circulation. For a chill, or premonitory symptoms of rheumatism and kidney complaint, particularly prevalent at these seasons it is the best possible remedy. It is also invaluable for dyspepsia, liver complaint, constipation and nervousness. Never set out on a winter or spring journey without it. Elderly persons and the delicate and convalescent are greatly aided by it.

In a month a caterpillar devours 6000 times its own weight in food.

Tribes Which Inhabit the Territory of Alaska.

LIFE AMONG THE HAPPY ESKIMOS.

Savages Probably of Different Blood than the American Indian.—Theory of Japanese Descent.

In spite of the efforts of the United States Government the white population of Alaska is not growing very rapidly, and agriculture, which is as yet confined almost entirely to the Yukon River Valley, is in a primitive state, although it is demonstrated that a vast amount of wheat and hops can be raised there. By far the larger part of the country is as yet unexplored, and the mountains are very high. In fact, it is a common belief among many of the natives that there are active volcanoes in the interior, and it can neither be affirmed nor denied by the whites. There are enough fertile valleys near the coast, however, to afford a livelihood for a large population, says a resident of Alaska in the Cincinnati "Enquirer."

I have studied these people, and do not agree with the ethnologists who claim that they are descended from the Japanese, although there is but little likelihood that their origin is the same as that of the American Indian. They have no traits in common, the Alaskan Eskimos being the happiest natured people on earth, constantly laughing and singing, and showing the strongest affection for each other, and even for white men. The natives have been classed in four great divisions—the Eskimo, or Innuit; the Aleut, or Oonangan; the Athabascan, or Tunich, and the Thiankit tribes. The Eskimos are best known, as they inhabit the coast line and are larger and more intelligent than the Esikmos of the Atlantic Coast. They would, however, seem to have a common origin. Their kayak, or skin canoe, is identical with that of the Greenlanders. This kayak, which is a covered boat, is found only among pure Eskimos, and is lost wherever there is an intermixture with other tribes.

In winter they live in underground sod-covered houses, and in sikn-covered tents in summer. Their implements are of stone, ivory or bone. They live on fish, seals, walrus and blubber, and usually clothe themselves in skins. There are no real chiefs and practically no government of any kind. Each village has a head man, called the oomailik, but he has very little authority, especially when compared with the medicine man, or shaman. When joint action is necessary it is determined upon by a council of the elders.

Their marriage relations are somewhat peculiar. Polygamy is rare, although not forbidden, and the people who live together in polygamy are ostracised by those who do not. A man may marry if his wife dies, but he cannot take a third wife. The marriage ceremony is very simple, consisting only in the bride, when her parents' consent is obtained, leaving her own house and going to that of the groom. Families are never large, rarely consisting of over two children, an Eskimo woman of 25 years being considered old. Great parental affection is shown. Children are treated with the greatest indulgence and allowed their own way, being taught to work, however, with the rude tools provided.

There is no time fixed as majority, the standard of manhood being the killing of a wolf, a reindeer, or a beluga whale. After such a feat the youth becomes a man. Meanwhile, the various stages of his life are marked by curious ceremonies. Feasts are held when his hair is trimmed for the first time (the men wear their hair trimmed all around the head, while the women wear it loose or plaited), when he first goes to sea alone in his kayak, when he makes his first expedition on snowshoes, and when his lip is cut to receive the labrets or ornaments worn on the under lips on each side of the mouth. Parents often go to great expense to procure amulets or chains from the shaman to protect their young from danger and evil spirits. These people are very superstitious about death, and although they hold festivals in memory of departed friends, a dying Eskimo is usually taken to a hut, where he is left alone to die. When a husband or wife dies the survivor cuts the front hair short and fasts for twenty-five days.

There are numerous festivals, the Eskimos being peculiarly a social people. These are often held in the lashga, a sort of town hall, and consist of singing and dancing of a primitive character, and then gorging with blubber, fish and reindeer fat. An annual festival is held in memory of departed kindred, and I attended one of these last fall on Norton Sound. At sunset the men gathered in the lashga, and, after a hurried bath, ornamented each other by tracing various figures upon the naked back with a mixture of oil and charcoal.

When the bodies and faces were thus decorated the females were admitted. Then with wild yells the men emerged from the fire hole, where they had concealed themselves. It was impossible to distinguish any complete figure, as some were crawling with their feet foremost, others on their hands and feet, all clinging together and moving like an immense snake. A number of men wore masks composed of the heads of various animals. The women bought them off with presents of bowls of soup and blubber, and the whole affair wound up with singing and dancing.

Each of the village head men—they can scarcely be called chiefs—show their importance by giving a festival, known as the "Pottach," upon which they frequently impoverish themselves, giving presents to those who show the most endurance in the dances. These are frequently kept up for a month at a time and the utmost good humor prevails.

The different tribes in Alaska have different religious beliefs. The Aleuts have two classes of spirits, good and bad, and believe also in a future state.

When an important member of a tribe dies a slave is killed to accompany him through the spirit world. The Athabascans and Thiankits preserve totemism, and totem poles can be found at the entrance to each of their villages. Totemism forms even a stronger tie with them than blood relationship. The totem clans are named Raven, Bear, Wolf, Whale, etc. and, as men may not marry in their own clans, the children belong to the clan of the mother. The Thiankits are the most advanced of all the tribes and occupy the best portion of Alaska.

Their traditions tell of two heroes who at the beginning of the world fought with the spirits of darkness for the future good of mankind. These two heroes or gods were the founders of the Raven and Wolf clans. They have a distinct notion of a Creator. The most important person in their mythology is Yeshl, of the Raven clan whom they credit with having c reated all physical objects. He is the friend of man; existed before he was born; never grows old, and never dies. He sends reminders of his existence by the east wind, which blows from his abode. He has a son who is even fonder of man than Yeshl himself, and frequently intercedes for the human race. They do not believe in a comomn stock for mankind, but think that Yeshl traveled from land to land, and made a new man with a new language in each. They believe in future rewards and punishments but their belief doesn't seem to have much effect upon their conduct.

These are the leading peculiarities of the Alaskan people. They will work as the American Indian will not, and are capable of being highly civilized. The Commercial Company, which virtually controls everything in Alaska, has worked them for years, and they have given satisfaction. The population is not large, and there are no means of telling the number, but 100,000 would probably more than cover it.

A few years ago a number of white men settled on the Yukon River, and, as a rule, have done well in both mining and agriculture. The gold fields bid fair to rival those of California, but have not been prospected enough for any intelligent estimate to be placed upon them.

COTTON PICKING.

One of the most remarkable mechanical devices recently introduced in Georgia is a cotton-picking machine. The dimensions of the machine are approximately nine feet in length, five feet in width and six feet in height. It is mounted on four metal-carriyng wheels and in general appearance is not unlike a road engine, expect that it is hauld by horses and receives the power to propel the working mechanism from the traction wheels. The rear wheels are four feet in diameter. The tires are eight inches wide and cleated on the rim to provide traction, ample to operate the mechanism for picking the cotton from the plants and the stripping devices and elevators in motion.

The object of the elevators is to deposit the cotton in large sacks located at the top near the rear end of the machine. The total weight of the machine is about 1,600 pounds, and of extremely light draught, and it can be dawn and operated by one pair of horses. The cotton-picking apparatus can be readily and almost instantly raised or lowered to suit the condition of the cotton and the surface of the ground on which it is operated. The picking and stripping mechanisms are entirely encased within light metalic cases, except the elongated slots through which the picking needles protrude. The needles are mounted on suitable bearings in vertical carriers, thirty-four in number, seventeen on each side, being linked together, working simultaneously. The gears are encased within the carriers. Each carrier in making the circuit of its oblong course makes nearly one turn on its own axis, and each needle while in the plant makes fiften revolutions, and five revolutions in the opposite direction while being stripped.

The needles are inserted longitudinally into the plant to an extended position, then rotated rapidly and moved backward at a speed corresponding to the forward rate of travel of the machine, thereby avoiding any movement of the needles in relation to the plant except a rotary motion. The needles are withdrawn longitudinally from the plant, and pass between yielding stationary strippers, whereby the cotton is deposited in elevators. The capacity of the machine is from six to eight acres per day, and from two to four bales per day, according to the yield. It takes fifteen ordinary hands a whole day to pick one bale, averaging about 100 pounds each, or 500 pounds of lint after it is ginned.

In the early part of this century the postage on a single sheet of paper was eight cents, and over forty miles the rate was increased, so that over five hundred miles a single sheet was twenty-five cents. But after a time these rates were gradually reduced until in 1845 a letter not over half an ounce was five cents under three hundred miles, and over that distance ten cents. Sir Rowland Hill, who was at the head of the postoffice department of England at this time, introduced the use of postage stamps in 1840, and also lessened the charges for postage. In 1847 the United States adopted the use of the postage stamp, the lowest-priced one being five cents.

SHE LOVED THE CZAR.

The Emperor's Secret Marriage with a Ballet-Girl.

SHE DIED WHEN HE CAST HER OFF.

The History of a Russian State Scandal which Hastened the Late Czar's Death—Proud Romanoffs.

By a tragedy in the family circle of the ruling houses of Europe there has been laid bare a hitherto hidden chapter in the life of the man who is now the ruler of "All the Russians." A beautiful woman, young, fair and graceful, blond and with big brown eyes, died ten days ago in Odessa, all but destitute, and of a broken heart.

She was Mlle. Ksezinska, once widely known as the "beautiful Labouskaia," the wife of the present White Czar, wedded morganatically to him early in September of last year, but his mistress ever since 1888, when Nicholas II., then Czarevitch and heir apparent, was a gay lad of twenty, and the flower of the noble youth of St. Petersburg and Warsaw.

Only the master mind of the late Czar kept the liaison from becoming one of the gravest scandals that modern Europe has known. Proud of the Romanoffs and proud of the dynasty of which he was a part, mindful too, of the traditional virtue of his wife, the example of which had raised Russian morality to its highest point, Alexander III. used all his efforts to suppress the affair. The bitterness of the blow will probably never be fully understood.

When late in 1890, the story came to his ears by the merest chance—the careless dropping of a word in the home circle—he fell in an apoplectic fit, and was revived with difficulty. In this is to be found the explanation of his long and painful illness, which culminated at the end of October in his death.

Had the facts relating to Mlle. Kesznska been known to the world three years ago, a letter that Alexander III. wrote to his father-in-law, the King of Denmark, would have been understood. Reference was made in it to the reprimanding of Prince Frederick Leopold, of Prussia, a cousin of the Kaiser, for insubordination and stupidity. Poor William! It makes him unhappy to have one relative unendowed with strategic qualities! He ought to be in my shoes, with thieves, malcontents, Reds and husbands of lewd women in his family circle.

For many months the Czarina Marie Fedorovna had kept the secret of the liaison of Nicholas, her first born, locked safe in her breast. When, however, the Czar insisted upon the young man's marriage, naming the Princess Alix of Hesse-Darmstadt as his first choice, the whole story came out literally at the mother's knee.

Marie Fedorovna well knew the effect this news would have on her husband, and how it would crush all his dearest hopes. She pleaded with her son to break once and for all, with Labouskaia the beautiful, but he steadfastly refused, threatening to renounce his rights of succession rather than desert his love.

The situation was complicated. Two children had been born to the Czarevitch by this woman, and the Czarina's fears as to the liaison's political importance were only too well founded. She delayed letting the news come to His Majesty, hoping that she could persuade her boy to let the good of Russia be his guiding influence.

When the Czar heard, however, and as soon as he had recovered from the illness and the nervous shock, he realized at once that something must quickly be done. Deportation to Siberia or the solitary and lifelong imprisonment of Marita Kezinska and her family in the battlemented and moated fortress of Schlusselburg were not to be thought of, for the reason that despite the system of secrecy of the Russian police rumors would undoubtedly spring up. "It is better to let sleeping dogs lie," communed the Czar. But one other course remained open—to get the Czarevitch away amid new scenes.

The famous tour around the world of the Czarevitch and the noisy Grand Duke George of Greece was planned. And the party set forth early in 1891. By the time they returned the infatuation had cooled, and had it not been for the pushing forward of the old matrimonial project it would probably never have been renewed. But in the same way that "Love laughs at locksmiths," it laughed with Prince Nicholas at the idea of a state marriage to a haughty Princesss while his heart really belonged to a pretty woman in a villa just outside of St. Petersburg. With defiance in his heart he wedded his inamorata, only two months and a half later to be forced into a political marriage and a state betrothal at the bedside of his dying father and master.

This romance was one of those that are worthy to go down as a great passion of history. Its end is a grave on the outskirts of Odessa, a provincial Russian town where mansions in the Italian style alternate with hovels. Its beginning was on the stage of the Grand Opera-House in Warsaw, where the Czarevitch, the leading figure in a gay box party, saw for the first time the celebrated danseuse, Maritza Kszinska, otherwise "the beautiful Labouskaia." She was the favorite toast for the Polish nobles at their banquets, because of her surpassing loveliness.

Only seventeen when she went upon the stage, Maritza at once danced herself into popular favor, and her twinkling feet were the admiration of the Polish Russia. She was but nineteen when in 1888 Nicholas met her. His rank gained him that very evening admission behind the scenes, and thenceforward he let his mad passion take full possession of him.

There is no question but what the beautiful Labouskaia loved as deeply as he did. For his sake she gave up the stage, its manifold attractions and the admiration that was hers throughout all Poland. And there is good reason to believe that it was not Nicholas the Czarevitch she loved, but Niholas the man. During the years they lived together she bore him two handsome sons, who are said to have the physical traits of the Romanoffs.

There were complications regarding Labouskaia that were heard with sorrow by Alexander III., when he knew the whole story. Not only was Mlle. Ksezinska of lowly birth, but her mother was an Israelite, of the race hated by the Russian autocracy. Curiously enough the girl was reared in the Catholic faith, in this breaking one of the strictest laws of the Russian code. Her father was a wine merchant in a small way, and the family at the best were hardly off the edge of poverty.

The coincidences of history are astounding. Almost at the very hour, certainly during the very month that the present Czar caught sight of the woman who has influenced his whole life twirling on her pink toes on the gorgeous stage of the Warsaw Opera-House, with the plaudits of Russian Poland deadening the music, he was introduced to the Princess Alix, who now bears the title of Czarina, "Little other," of the Russian Empire. The courtiers of the royal palace wondered that the proud and dainty Princess of Hesse-Darmstadt did not impress the young Nicholas more. It was an open secret that this girl of sixteen was intended to become the next Czarina, and the court treated her as such.

The young people saw each other every day, but on the part of the Czarevitch, at least, the friendship was purely a platonic one. It could not well be else with the image of the Labouskaia in his heart and his first great passion at its flood.

The Czar, ignorant of the tragedy then building up and soon to be played, asked his son twice if he would marry Princess Alix. Twice the answer came in the negative. Yet so anxious was the Czar that Nicholas felt some excuse was necessary. Craftily he feigned a liking for the Princess Marie of Greece. It was an admirable subterfuge to gain time, and one not involving much risk, for the relationship between the two dynasties was very close. On just these grounds the Queen of Greece objected, and emphatically refused her consent.

Another delay was occasioned by a prospect young Nicholas suggested of a marriage to one of the daughters of the reigning Prince of Montenegro. This fell through from the final lack of interest on the Czarevitch's part, and the Czar, discouraged for the time being, let the matter rest.

Meanwhile the beautiful ex-dancer and mistress of a charming villa was living a life of ease and luxury. That she expected to wed her lover at some time there is little doubt. Certainly the cards were all played that way. She must have known how it would all end, nevertheless.

Until his dying father's fiat came in the early days of last fall that he must marry with all speed the Princess Alix and close this chapter of illicit love, Nicholas had seen little of his inamorata since his return from his long tour. Once the imperative orders for marriage came, however, he went post-haste to Warsaw and wedded his Maritza quietly in the little town of Kallsch, Russian Poland. Immediately after this the Labbouskaia went to St. Petersburg and was secretly placed by her husband in a small but beautifully fitted-up palace in the suburbs, purchased in her maiden name by an officer of the Chevalier Guard Regiment acting under the instructions of the Czarevitch.

The public betrothal of Nicholas and the Princess Alix came shortly after. The death of the Czar Alexander and the royal wedding of the new Czar followed in rapid succession. Heart-broken though she was then, the true wife of Nicholas II. gave no sign.

But the story had gone beyond the family ears, though the new Czarina was kept in ignorance of it. Possibly through the influence of Marie Fedorovna possibly by the order of Czar Nicholas himself, his feelings changed because of his accession and new responsibilities, and this cruel and final blow was dealt.

Pobedonosteff, Procurator of the Holy Synod, delivered the following message: "Mademoiselle can never hope for recognition; the Kalisch ceremony was idle mockery." As plainly as anything can be inferred, this meant that if for one moment the Labouskaia claimed to be more than Nicholas's mistress she, her whole family and the man who performed the Kalisch ceremony would at once be transported to Siberia, beyond a possibility of return.

It is no wonder, with all the forces of the Russian Governmental machinery against her, harsh and implacable as they are, that she returned in her loneliness to the scene of her girlish triumphs six years ago at Warsaw, and from there found her way into Odessa to die. Alone and among strangers she ended a life full of sadness that but adds to the romance of her royal love. No Russian law could help her to gain her marital rights, for kings and princes have their own peculiar marriage code.

Grand Duke George, next to Nicholas in the line of succession, contracted a morganatic marriage with a peasant girl of Livadia, in the Crimea, a few years ago. Prince George has renounced his rights of succession, however, and is slowly dying of consumption; hence this marriage is condoned, and the young woman has been recognized and treated with some courtesy. She was a Mlle. Misch of Tiflis, and like Maritza she possesses wondrous beauty.

Nor have other mesalliances been unknown among the present heirs of the house of Peter. Grand Duke Nicholas, a brother of the late Czar, was on the eve of marrying a notorious woman of the town, and was arrested by the Czar just in time to prevent the ceremony. However, he has continued to live with the woman openly. Grand Duke Michael, another brother, married the Countess Merenberg, a most unfortunate match, for this lady was the daughter of the Prince of Nassau and his morganatic wife. Grand Duke Nicholas's widowed mother, the Grand Duchess Alexandrovna Petrosna, is now living in a cloister at Kiev. She was banished by the Czar on account of the numerous scandals connected with her name. There are many tales of the gay life she led in her young days, despite her dignity as a Princess of Oldenburg.—New York World.

MENTAL DELUSIONS.

The delusions and vagaries that rack and torture the human mind, flitting with lightning rapidity through the brains of men and women addicted to the inordinate use of intoxicants, when either reach the stage of delirium commonly called "jim-jams," is something unaccountable. How the disordered brain and the shattered nervous system of the inebriate is racked and tortured, as evidenced by their imaginary fears and incoherent utterances, is truly pitiable to behold. Not infrequently attacks of delirium tremens come so violent that the strait-jacket and padded cell are resorted to by hospital attendants to prev nt the poor fellow from doing violence to himself.

When delirium sets in the vagaries or delusions of the afflicted person assume different shapes and forms. More frequently than otherwise the sufferer fancies himself close upon a mass of writhing snakes and other crawling reptiles from which he shrinks away, with eyes bulging from their sockets and perspiration starting from every pore, howling and shrieking in agony of affright, until the vital system becomes totally exhausted and death frees him from his imaginary tormentors. No sober man could possibly conjure up the hideous objects that arise before the drunken man's vision. Some years ago I saw a young fellow named Jarvis in a hotel who had been on a protracted spree, suddenly spring in affright from his bed, where his watchers had left him apparently in a sound sleep, and rush into the dining room, where he seized a long, keen-edged carving knife. With this, striking at imaginary pursuers and running wildly up and down the room, he drove his mother, sisters and half-dozen others out of the place. Rushing to an open window he climbed out upon two narrow brackets just below, shouting, "Now I've got away from you." Fortunately, the knife slipped from his hand and the onlookers momentarily expected that he would lose his footing and be dashed to death upon the pavement below. But he reopened the window, which he had closed, and climbed in, falling lifeless upon the floor. In women reaching the stage of delirium from drink their disordered brain generally pictures a villain with uplifted knife pursuing them, intent on blood. Numbers of instances have occurred in which a poor creature in her flight from such imaginary danger has leaped from a window or the roof and been instantly killed. The subject brings to mind a story. The other afternoon a fellow, whom I will call Tom Jones, who was on a three-weeks' spree, for his were no abbreviated rackets, wandered to the end of a North River pier, where he uneasily glanced about him, occasionally shifting from plank to plank, as if to get out of the way of something or other. There he was found by his friend Tim, who had been hunting for him for two hours.

"What the deuce are you doing down here, Tom," asked Tim, observing his friend's scared look.

"Hush! Hush!" said Tom; "do you see anything?"

"Oh, rats!" responded Tim.

"Do you see 'em, too?" inquired Tom, in a shrill voice.

"Why, of course I do," said Tim; "they are running all about you and coming from all directions. Don't talk so loud, or you'll scare 'em away!"

"Th—thas—so—that's so (hic)," replied Tom, as, with affrighted look, he sprang forward and siezed his friend's arm. "I—th (hic) thought I had 'em a—(hic) agin. An' you've got 'em, too (hic). Les skip the ra—(hic) ras—rats an' go take 'nother drink (hic)" and with that he dragged his friend off the pier muttering "Rats, an' so you've got 'em, too."—New York Mercury.

JANET WAS UNKIND.

"Now, Janet," said her mother, sternly, "there is one thing I want to impress upon you. Mrs. De Bouillon, of Chicago, is coming to spend a few days with me. Her little boy is very lame, was born that way, and you must not say one word to him about it. Think how it would be if you were lame. Do be a good girl."

"I will," said Janet.

All went well for a few hours. Little De Bouillon was very crooked and very spoiled. Janet displayed toys and books and put up with a good deal of irritable comment. Finally two shrill voices rose over the ladies' conversation.

"I don't like your old house in Avondale," screamed the cripple. "We got one lots nicer."

"I don't believe it," retorted Janet; "'cause the Chicago children looks like they come off of remnant counters."

Friend from the next street (to happy father): Halloa, Jills, let me congratulate you. I hear that you have a new boy at your house. Happy father: By George! can you hear him all that distance?

HOW PAPER IS MADE.

What a Tree Passes Through in One Hour.

THE WAR HAS CAUSED A CHANGE.

And Now Linen Rags are Chiefly Used for Writing Paper—Imported from the Old Country.

Paper made from wood is the result of a war measure. Old rags, from which almost all paper was made before Fort Sumter was fired upon, rose in value during the dark days which followed. The paper makers were compelled to look around for a substitute. A bright man thought of wood pulp, and before long machinery and chemicals were doing what the wasps and hornets had been doing for thousands of years—making paper out of trees.

When the patents on the process and machinery for making wood pulp had expired, wood pulp paper mills sprung up wherever spruce, water and railroad transportation combined to fill out the necessary conditions for desirable sites. Improvements in the process and machinery lowered the cost of production; competition brought prices down, and the poorest man in the country, says the Chicago Record, was able to read the newspapers.

The lumbermen who spend the winters in the hearts of the forests in the northern tier of States cutting down spruce trees select trees varying from seven inches to eighteen inches in diameter. When the spruce log reaches the wood pulp mill it is cut into short lengths from sixteen inches to four feet long. Before it is ground into pulp the bark must be removed, and this is done rapidly by means of a machine called the "barker," a sort of circular plane which revolves at a high speed. Stripped of its bark, the block of wood is carried to the "grinder." This is a large grindstone, sometimes two feet thick. The log is held by hydraulic pressure against the stone, and water is kept running on the stone to prevent the wood from burning.

The stone rubs or grinds the log into pulp, which falls down on a screen, where the splinters or slivers are caught, the fine pulp passing through the meshes. A pump sucks up the pulp through the vat or box to a brass plate which is perforated with small holes. The pulp is really a liquid, capable of being pumped or carried in a stream from place to place, and it is next pumped upon what is called the "wet machine." Here it is spread on a woolen blanket or on felt, where some, but not all, of the water is pressed from it, and it is left in layers, which are called "laps." In this condition it looks like a newspaper which, after being soaked in water, is squeezed in the hand. It is solid enough to be carried about, and the "laps" are made into bundles, each weighing about one hundred pounds. In this shape it is shipped to the paper mill, for only the larger mills make their own wood pulp.

Paper made entirely of wood pulp would not be strong enough to stand the wear and tear of the huge printing presses which turn the "white paper" into newspaper. The "grinder" brakes up the fibers so that the paper would not hang together in passing over the tapes, through the rolls and cylinders and folders. To give it strength the papermaker must restore the fiber. Until within a few years this was done by cutting up rags, flax, cotton waste and other fibers and mixing the fragments with the wood pulp. But most of the newspapers now are made entirely from wood, for what is known as "sulphite fiber" has taken the place of the other fibers. The sulphite fiber, or, as it is commonly called, "sulphite," is really wood pulp also, but it is not made by grinding, and the fibers therefore are not broken up. The sulphite is made by boiling the wood in a large boiler called a "digester," with steam and a product of sulphur. The wood is digested or disintegrated into fibers, which, however, retain their full strength.

The wood pulp and sulphite, in proper proportions, are mixed together in an oblong tub called the "engine;" after they are thoroughly mixed, colored and sized," the pulp becomes "half-stock," and is pumped into tanks or vats and then upon a screen, which catches any foreign substance which might have fallen into the half-stock. Then it is ready for the paper machine. Here the pulp, which looks like rich milk, is spread over an endless mesh or screen which carries it toward the cylinders and rollers which make the finished paper. As the watery pulp travels toward the rolls, the screen vibrates and the water drops through, leaving the pulp a broad sheet of mushy paper. This sheet passes over perforated plates through which the remaining water is sucked by pumps; between rolls which press it into a more compact condition and make it stronger; between other rolls which squeeze it again and then deliver it on to an endless belt of felt, which carries it over and under large cylinders heated by steam and finally feeds it into the "calender" rolls, where the paper is smoothed and pressed into the finished product. From the last "stock" of calenders the paper is made into rolls, which are shipped to the newspapers ready for the presses. In the paper mills which make their own wood pulp the pulp is pumped directly to the "engine" instead of first being made into "laps." In these mills the log can be barked, ground to pulp and carried through to the roll of finished paper ready for shipment all in an hour.

Although wood-pulp paper is largely used in making cheap books, as well as newspapers, book publications of more expensive grades, writing paper and ledger paper are made from linen rags. Most of the rags are imported, and the cast-off clothing of millions of Chinese, Egyptians, Turks, Syrians and East Indians, has found its way to the paper mills of New England to be made into dainty writing paper, beautiful books and thick ledgers for prosperous business men. As the rags are dirty when they are received in the paper mills, they are first thrown into the "duster."

This is a machine having a wooden roll with iron or wooden spikes on it. This roll revolves, and the rags, caught on the spikes, are beaten against other iron spikes, which stick out from the sides of the machine. As the well-dusted rags fall out of the duster they fall upon a broad belt, which carries them into the 'rag room."

Women and girls pick up each rag as it falls on the tables and inspect it. They cast away all but linen rags, cut off the buttons with large knives which are fixed in the tables and rip up the seams. "Finders keepers" is the rule in the rag room, and sometimes the girls find valuable gems, rings and jewels in the rags, and instances of large rolls of English bank notes found by the girls in the pockets of Egyptian garments are on record. From the rag room the rags go to the "cutters," where they are sliced by machinery into tiny bits, and then they are boiled in lime water to remove the color. They are then ground to a pulp and the rags become half-stock.

After being whitened by bleaching compounds, the half-stock is taken to the "beater," a machine which completes the pulping process, and it is then taken to the paper machine, where the process of finishing the paper is similar to that used in making wood pulp paper.

The hand-made papers are made by dipping the pulp from a vat with a sieve. The water runs through the sieve, and the solid pulp spread on a thin sheet is left on the bottom of the sieve. The paper-maker turns the sieve upside down and drops the sheet on a board. The paper is then finished by passing it between smooth, heavy iron rolls.

Paper-makers are beginning to dispute the claims made by rolling mill men that this is the age of steel. They bring out paper car wheels, paper barrels, paper buckets, paper boats, paper tubs, paper clothing and even paper horseshoes. They point to the paper boards and planks which can be handled and sawed like wood and made into buildings, and they predict that "straw-board" and straw-paper" have possibilities which, when developed, will make the age of paper a certainty.

WASHINGTON IN 1838.

I traveled through Virginia, passing by all those spots where four-and-twenty years later I was to watch the bloodiest battles of the war of secession, that first and awful convulsion of the great republic's manhood. Reaching Washington I was most courteously received by President Van Buren. How often since then I have been back at the white house under Presidents Tyler, Buchanan and Lincoln, writes Prince de Joinville in his memoirs. How many a curious scene I have witnessed there, under the rule of the last-named President, rich as it was in dramatic incident. During the first day of my stay in Washington I made the acquaintance of three of the greatest men in the United States—Calhoun, Webster and Clay—Calhoun of Carolina, the impassioned Southerner; Webster, the eloquent representative of New England puritanism, and Clay of Kentucky, with his angular face and powerful frame and a curious mixture of extreme gentleness and energy in his manner and ways—the very type of the western population, the advance guard of civilization. I was present at several sittings of the Senate and heard these gentlemen speak with an authority which seemed to fascinate their auditors. Washington as a city did not interest me at all—bits of town scattered about in an ocean of dust, which later on I knew as an ocean of mud; hotels crowded with canvassers, all devouring so hurriedly at table d'hote time that the first arrivals were rising from the table when the last ones were sitting down, and all this amid a noise of jaws that reminded me of the dogs being fed in a kennel; the whole population, whether politicians or canvassers, chewing and spitting everywhere; little society or none at all, save that formed by the foreign diplomats, most of them clever men, but bored by their isolation and consequently disposed to see everything around them with unfavoring eyes. One of the chief members of this society at the time of my sojourn was the British minister, Mr. Fox, a diplomatist of the old school, past master in the forms and proprieties and social refinements—everything that the English sum up in the word "proper."

The House Merchant, Marine Committee has reported favorably the Senate bill to postpone from March 1, 1895, to a date to be fixed by President Cleveland's proclamation, the date for enforcing the revised international regulations to prevent collisions at sea. This postponement is occasioned by the recent withdrawal of Great Britain and other nations of their assent to March 1st.

Bills have been passed by the House to prevent transportation of merchandise in bond through the United States to the free zone in Mexico, and retiring Don Carlos Buell as a Brigadier-General of the United States Army.

Denver has two fire and police boards. Governor Waite's old board refuses to retire in favor of the new board which was named by the State Senate.

The problem of county government seems to be a bigger one than the average legislature is able to solve, yet the coustitution points out a plain and easy way. It says that for purposes of having a uniform system of county government the counties shall be classified according to population. The present government law, like all that have preceded it, and the one which was to supersede it, makes as many classes as there are counties, thus making the legislative representatives from each county in the irresponsible duty of regulating the cost of government for their own counties. This is in contravention to the spirit of the Constitution if not to the letter. What the people need is a legislature to pass a general law for county governments, placing with the Supervisors the power to adapt to the needs of their respective counties. Then the people of any county can have as good county government as they deserve. If they are fit to exercise the privilege of self-government they will have good government. The responsibility will be put where it belongs, on the people.

The Redwood City "Democrat" says: The New York evening Post supplies a little cold comfort to Democrats and a timely rebuke to uncandid Republican partizans in showing that the Fifty-first congress was quite as bad if not as incompetent as the Fifty third. It recalls the fact that the Harrison-Reed-McKinley regime squandered a surplus of $163,000,000, increased the pensions $75,000,000, and gave $10,000,000 to sugar growers, reduced the gold reserve to the danger point and had bonds prepared for a government loan, which, however it managed to tide over and unload on the Cleveland administration.

Chauncey M. Depew seems to think that silver will not be the issue in the next campaign, because he has discovered no silver sentiment in the east. Chauncey had better come west. By so doing he will probably get light that will cause him to change his mind about silver coinage being an issue next year. In the minds of the masses it is an issue now, and it will be more so as more thought is given to the subject. Chauncey's associations are with railroad magnates and Wall street bankers.

Among the bills signed by the Governor is the Spencer primary election law, which provides for the holding of all primary elections in the State on the same day, under one set of officers at each polling place and with differently colored tickets for each party. This is a principle of political reform that Governor Budd announced during the campaign as a sovereign remedy for bossism and disgraceful scenes that have been enacted at San Francisco and other parts of the State.

The orange growers of Los Angeles seem hard to please. The frost has killed the crop in Florida, and put back the industy there for years, yet the Los Angeles men are jumping on Senator White for not piling up a higher protective tariff on that fruit. If the Senator sees fit to reply to the criticisms that are being heaped upon him it is hoped he will make his reply a rattling hot lecture on hoggishness addressed especially to people who want to tax everybody else for their own particular benefit.

The San Francisco "Report" which has been the staunchest supporter of all the papers since it found that he was elected, feels constrained to call the attention of Mayor Sutro to the circumstance that he was elected mainly to fight "the octopus" rather than the Spring Valley Water Company. It fears that Sutro is falling down in the struggle and is only too willing to take up some other fight. The "Report" probably knows Sutro as well as any body else does.

The Monroe doctrine has never been enforced by this country. But it always serves a purpose when any foreign nation threatens to interfere in any of the republics of North or South America.

A SHOCKING ACCIDENT.

Last Friday afternoon this community was shocked by a telegram stating that Charley Noland had been killed in a train wreck near Wabuska. The sad news was received with deep regret as Charley was well known here and very popular, having formerly been station agent at Citrus. The Walker Lake Bulletin contains the following:

"A frightful accident occurred last Friday afternoon about three miles north of Wabuska, by which Charles F. Noland, a brakeman, was killed. At Wabuska 16 cars were loaded with cattle consigned to the Miller & Lux estate, San Francisco. Besides these the train consisted of two passenger, one fast freight and one mail and express car. At a point about three miles north of Wabuska the track makes a slight curve and it was at this place that the accident occurred. The accident is believed to have been caused by the cattle in the cars all crowding to the lower side, causing the cars to lurch and finally to turn clear over. Charley Noland was on top of one of the cars and when he saw they were going to leave the track either jumped or was thrown off. The fall evidently stunned him, as it was the second car behind the one that he was on which fell upon him. It is believed that his death was instantaneous. As soon as the train could be stopped all hands began the work of extricating the young man from beneath the car. This was extremely difficult as he was buried under a car loaded with cattle. It necessary to smash the side of the car out to liberate the cattle before they could reach their unfortunate comrade. When found life was extinct. His remains were brought to Hawthorne Saturday morning on a special. The wreck to the cars is the most serious that ever occurred on the C. & C. Eleven cattle cars were thrown from the track and several of them were smashed to splinters. They were flung on both sides of the track and one car was lodged directly across the track. Twenty-five head of cattle were killed outright or crippled so badly that they had to be shot. Many others escaped to the mountains. An engine was sent to Dayton and Coroner Hawkins taken to the scene. A jury was summoned and an inquest held. A verdict was rendered in accordance with the facts, and the employés and trainmen were exonerated from blame. An examination of the trucks and wheels showed they were in first-class condition. A wrecking train and large gang of men were sent from Hawthorne and worked three days clearing the wreck.

Charles F Noland was the eldest son of Samuel D. Noland who for many years has been the master blacksmith in the Hawthorne railroad shops. Charley was raised from early boyhood in Hawthorne and has worked for the railroad company since he was fifteen years old. He was one of the most popular boys on the road and was beloved by a wide circle of acquaintance. Deceased was a member of Lodge No. 113, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. He was born in Downieville, Cal., August 25, 1872, and would have been 23 years old next August. The funeral took place Sunday afternoon and every available vehicle in town was utilized and yet a large number of mourners walked to the cemetery to pay their last tribute to their deceased friend."

George T Ryves came down on last Monday's train and was in town early in the week. He is accompanied by Professor Potter of the Washington University and President of the Mining Engineers Association, also President of the S. Louis Smelting Company. It is understood that the gentlemen come here to examine the Hirsch mine with a view of purchasing the property.

The Keeler and Mojave stage line has made a change of time that will be a great convenience to the traveling public. The stage now leaves Keeler at 8 o'clock Monday and Friday evenings and leaves Mojave Wednesday and Sunday mornings at 8:30 o'clock. Close connection is made with C. & C. trains at Keeler and with the S. P. at Mojave.

Charley Summers came down from Round Valley and spent a couple of days interviewing the stockmen of this vicinity during the week. Charley recently met with a painful accident; he had lassoed a horse and in running through a gate the animal he was riding was thrown and in the melee Charley was badly bruised about the head.

George Meads and Rudolph Schober arrived yesterday from Bishop with sixteen animals and two wagons. They started for Salt Wells Valley this morning to haul borax to Mojave. The Company has about twenty tons of borax ready for shipment and the plant is running steadily.

TWENTY FIVE DOLLARS will be paid by the Sheriff of Inyo County, for information leading to the arrest and conviction of any person or persons guilty of selling, giving, or in any manner furnishing intoxicating liquors to Indians in the County of Inyo.

Be on your Guard.

If some grocers urge another baking powder upon you in place of the "Royal," it is because of the greater profit upon it. This of itself is evidence of the superiority of the "Royal." To give greater profit the other must be a lower cost powder, and to cost less it must be made with cheaper and inferior materials, and thus, though selling for the same, give less value to the consumer.

To insure the finest cake, the most wholesome food, be sure that no substitute for Royal Baking Powder is accepted by you.

Nothing can be substituted for the Royal Baking Powder and give as good results.

THE MILKMAID'S PROCESSION.

Among the lost customs of Merry England is that of the milkmaids' procession on May day. The manner of their going was as follows: They borrowed a great quantity of silver plate—not sham plate—real solid silver plate—dishes, butter boats, cream jugs, tankards, etc. They built up the plate round an obelisk, crowning the whole with a tea urn. They arranged the most showy flowers of the season between and about the silver.

This obelisk was carired by two chairmen in gold laced hats and followed by a troop of handsome milkmaids dressed in pink and blue gowns, "drawn through the pocket holes," whatever that means, with high-heeled shoes, mob caps, lappets of lace on their shoulders, nosegays in their bosoms and flat" Woffington hats" covered with ribbons. A fiddler went first in a sky-blue coat and hat adorned with ribbons.

The procession stopped before the doors of the cutomers, and the milkmaids danced. The story is told by John Thomas Smith, formerly keeper of prints and drawings in the British Museum. I intend, if I can, to make a list of the losses to London during the nineteenth century. Churches and houses, ruins and remains—these will come first. Next, and quite as lamentable, will be the old customs and observances. There are no longer any handsome milkmaids—they are all transformed into men; and one would like to see the face of any silversmith of whom the milkman should invite the loan of a few silver cups and urns. —London Queen.

A DOUBLE BACK-SOMERSAULT.

A Baking Powder Company was too Hasty in Its Claims.

A Chicago baking powder concern, advertising far and near that its product received the highest award for strength, purity and excellence at the Chicago World's Fair, has been obliged to take a double somersault backward. Mr. John Boyd Thatcher, chairman of the Agricultural Awards, has written a letter to the said Chicago concern, showing it that its advertising statements, speaking mildly, are incorrect, while the Judge of Awards on Baking Powders sends another in which he brands the claim of the pretenders as false, in the most unmistakable language. Since, comes the second exposure to the effect that this baking powder for which these spurious claims have been made was actually found by the Exposition chemists who analysed it to contain ammonia! Is this the reason that the commissioners declined to give it an award for purity and wholesomeness?

"Madam, would you kindly subscribe something for the missions in Africa? The money will be used for the conversion of heathen children." "Very well; you may have a few children converted and send the bill to me!"

The bazars in Persia are closed in memory of Hassan Shirasei, who achieved passing fame by issuing an edict against the use of tobacco and who has just died, aged eighty-four.

LOVE IN A BARREL

By HOWARD PYLE.

CHAPTER I.

A long row of some dozen or so great stone mills, with roofs tall and steep, or hipped and gabled, and with walls whitened with flour, gaping by open sheds and half doors upon a sunny stretch of dusty road, they stand upon the steep, bluff shore of a river. Upon the road they are two stories high; upon the river front they are four, five, or even six. In some seasons sloops, brigs and barks are lashed to the river walls loading with barrels of flour or cornmeal, the shouts of the stevedores and the creaking of blocks and tackles echoing from stony wall to stony wall. On the decks lounge a few idle sailors in baggy breeches or petticoats, club queues down their backs and cocked hats or Monterey caps upon their heads; and upon the road in front of the mill doors stand clustered the queer old vehicles of the day—farmers' carts, coopers' carts, great Conestoga wagons dragged by teams of eight, ten or twelve mules, and which travel sometimes even as far as Pittsburg.

Upon the farther side of the road from the mills is the millrace, brimming with the speeding waters that in the night time fill the silence with the brawling of their hurrying rush. Here and there side streams shoot under the bridges and lift floodgates and set the huge, groaning wheels a-turning, and the rude machinery and great millstones to jarring and turning in answer.

Such, one hundred years ago, were the famous old Brandywine flour mills, which ground more meal during the Revolution and for the old West India trade than was ground at any other place in the country.

CHAPTER II.

"Uncle," she said in a breathless whisper, "will he die?"

It was on the evening of the twelfth of September, in the year seventeen hundred and seventy-seven. The yellow sunlight streamed in through the windows, and all the room was full of the good smell of supper. The blue china cups and saucers and plates and dishes, the pewter spoons, and the iron knives and two-pronged forks, polished till they shone like silver, caught the light and winked and sparkled and twinkled back again at the broad yellow patches of light on the floor.

Friend Sparks and his family sat at supper, but though the smell of it was so good the knives and forks and spoons clattered in a listless fashion, and the family ate and drank without much heart in the matter.

"I don't know," said Friend Joseph, laying down his knife and fork and looking around at his daughters, and more especially at his niece, Mattie Dixon—"I don't know what it is that sets you girls so agog over a laced hat and epaulets and a blue coat and brass buttons. Here was General Washington and his army not more than a month in town, and now, because he has gone and takes away with him his snipe jack aids-de-camp and captains and majors, all the women in Wilmington and Brandywine are in the vapors."

Now men are not quick at seeing things, but the women knew very well why Mattie Dixon's eyes were red. Indeed, a gloom had fallen upon them all ever since a young farmer had ridden down from Chadd's Ford that morning, bringing the news of a great battle that had been fought up the Brandywine. Later in the day two farmers' wagons had passed through the village, bringing each a load of wounded men lying in the straw.

But Friend Joseph Sparks did not notice Mattie's red eyes.

"I do not," said he presently, separating the don't in his emphasis—"I do not see what it is about a shedder of blood that turns a woman's head. I, for one, should be sorry to see a daughter or a niece of mine tied to such an unregenerate, soulless son of Anak as one of those young men who make bloodshed a trade, and think that a blue coat and brass buttons excuse murder. Now there was a battle fought yesterday," he continued, leaning back in his chair and folding his hands, "and no doubt a many likely young men killed or maimed for life. There was that Philip Van Cleiff who came here so often when"— The worthy Friend was suddenly interrupted in his monologue by Mattie Dixon rising so precipitately as to knock her chair over backward with a loud clatter upon the floor, and then hurrying from the room without a word, feeling in her pocket for her handkerchief as she went.

Friend Sparks stared after her with open eyes. A momentary pause followed as the door banged behind the girl.

"How could thou talk so, Joseph?" said the good mother presently. "Didn't thou see that it was as much as she could do to contain her spirits?" Then she, too, pushed back her chair and followed her niece.

"Botheration!" said Friend Sparks, and then he also pushed back his chair with a loud scrape upon the floor, and taking his pipe from the mantel shelf, filled it with tobacco and lit it with a coal he chose very carefully from the embers on the hearth.

His three daughters, Rebecca, Mary Jane and Susan, said nothing, but as he went out of the door in a swirling cloud of tobacco smoke they exchanged very meaning glances.

Friend Joseph Sparks was one right well known in the milling circles of his day; a wealthy man as times went, a keen bargainer, but as honest as the palm of your hand. He was the owner of three of the largest of the Brandywine mills, and sat in the gallery, as it was called, in Friends' meeting; for, like all of the Brandywine millers, he was a Quaker.

He was a man perhaps too keen and caustic in his speech, but with a good sound heart buried in the prickly husk. He alone of all those Quaker millers dared to grind flour during the dark days of Valley Forge. Now he leaned over the front gate of the garden feeling very uncomfortable at the thought of having made Mattie cry, looking absently up the road and puffing curling wreaths of smoke into the breathless air.

The sun had set and the glimmering gray of twilight had fallen. A cart came slowly moving down the white stretch of road—a farm cart from up in the country. A board was laid across it, and on the board sat two men—one a farmer, the other an officer in the Continental army.

Friend Sparks watched them with a sort of dull curiosity. So many of the broken army had passed by ones and twos through the village that day that the sharp edge of interest was worn off.

But as the cart came up to him it stopped. "Do you know any one living here by name Joseph Sparks?" said the officer.

"I am Joseph Sparks," answered the miller, opening his gate and coming out. "Who has thee there in the cart, friend?" looking into the straw.

"A friend of yours," said the officer, "who was hurt yesterday in the battle."

As he spoke the figure raised itself from the straw where it lay, and turned toward the miller a face white as death, the head and jaws bound around with a bloody cloth, and a pair of eyes dull and languid.

The good Quaker hardly recognized in the pale, woebegone figure the gay young Major Van Cleiff, who had visited at the house so frequently during the last month.

He stood staring, agape, holding his pipe idly in his hand. "Is thee much hurt?" said he at last.

"I don't know," said the young man faintly.

"Can't you lodge him somewhere till he gets some doctoring?" asked the officer.

Friend Sparks stood for a moment sunk in troubled thought. "Nay," said he at last, "I can't bring him into the house. If the British should come, as it's likely they will, it would bring trouble that I have no right to shoulder. I can lodge him at the mill, and will make him as comfortable as I can." And so it was arranged.

Friend Joseph followed the cart down the short hill to the mill door, and there saw the wounded man carried into the loft, where a bed of empty bags was made upon a pile of wheat. Then leaving the mill foreman to watch the patient, he went back to the house for his coat and hat.

The news of the coming of the wounded man had already flown through the house. Mattie met him at the door, and as he stood in the dark entry, gripped him by the wrist with both hands. "Uncle," she said in a breathless whisper, "uncle, will he die?"

"I don't know," said Friend Sparks in an answering whisper; "no, I think not." He could just see her pale face in the gathering darkness.

"Oh, uncle!" she said, in the same gasping whisper. "He asked me to marry him before he went away. If he dies my heart will break." And she began to cry convulsively.

Friend Sparks stood quite still for awhile. "I am going for Doctor Shallcross," said he at last, and then Mattie let go his wrist and he left her, shutting the sitting room door softly behind him.

"After all, it is no such great matter," said the doctor, as he and Friend Sparks walked across the road from the mill to the house in the starry darkness. "It is a sword stroke upon the side of the head, but the brain is not injured. He is only faint from loss of blood. I sewed up the cut, and 'll come again to see him tomorrow morning. I wonder," he added, "that they should have sent him here to Wilmington instead of taking him to Philadelphia along with them."

"Never mind," said Friend Sparks. "He is here now, and I'll make him as comfortable as I can."

Mattie Dixon awakened at early dawning the next morning with the dripping of the rain falling upon the roof—pat! pat! and an unusual sound of men's voices out in the road before the house—loud talking and laughter. She jumped out of bed and ran to the window, and saw upon the other side of the road a sight that made her heart stand still.

A row of stacked muskets stood under the trees among the yellow leaves. Accoutrements, haversacks and cartridge boxes hung from the crossed bayonets, and squatting, lolling and sitting upon the ground were some two score of soldiers in tall grenadier hats, with white leggins upon their legs, and the blaze of red coats shining from under the cloaks hung loosely across their shoulders. Three or four officers sat upon a bench between two of the maple trees, and the white smoke from a fire rose sluggishly up through the half naked branches.

The British had come.

Without waiting an instant Mattie slipped on a petticoat over her nightgown, and in her bare feet ran down stairs and burst into her uncle's room. "Uncle!" she cried, "the British have come!"

Joseph Sparks sat up in bed as though moved by a spring.

"Oh!" cried the girl, wringing her hands, "the soldiers will find him and kill him or send him to the hulks."

"Botheration!" said Friend Sparks, "thou thinks of nothing but the young man. Go and get dressed. Thou's a spectacle."

"If he was only a barrel of flour," said Friend Joseph, as the family sat at a melancholy breakfast that morning. "I'd get him away as easy as goose grease." And then again they all sat silent in thought.

"Uncle," said Mattie suddenly, "does thee remember those double barrels that thee had made to send cornmeal to Jamaica in the Nancy schooner before the war? Could a man get into one of them?"

"Perhaps so," said the miller, "if"—He stopped suddenly and pushed back his chair. "Why, thou's hit it, girl," he cried. "We might barrel him up and send him off—eh, mother? Why, one of those West Indian double barrels would be the very thing."

"We might send him to sister Jane, in Chester," said Rebecca Sparks, looking at her husband.

"No, no; that would never do," said the miller. "No man could be cramped in a barrel five or six hours. Remember, too, that he's wounded. I tell thee what we can do. We can send him to Cousin Jane Penny; that's only four miles. We might say that we were sending a barrel to Chester, and they would never know that it stopped on the way—tschk!" said he suddenly. "Here we are in a rut; who's to take the barrel?"

It was a point that they had not thought of.

"Can't John Binney take him?" said Rebecca. John Binney was the mill foreman.

"I don't see how he could," said Friend Sparks; "they would know that John Binney would never go to Chester with a barrel of flour. If the boys were only home" (by the boys he meant the two sons, Reuben and John), "they might do it."

In the pause that followed Mattie suddenly arose and went to her uncle and kneeled beside his chair. "Uncle," said she in a low voice.

"What is it, Mattie?"

"One day when aunt and thee were away from home I put on the clothes that Reuben wore when he was a boy." She bowed her head, and a long pause of silence followed. The old clock in the corner said sharply, "tick, tack." At last Friend Sparks broke the silence, and he spoke in a voice more gentle than his usual acrid tone. "Thou may put them on again, Mattie," said he.

CHAPTER III.

"Because I am a poor girl and am trying to save my dear friend."

Colonel Gorse had made the counting room of the great north mill his headquarters. He was lighting his pipe at a candle when the glass door opened and Friend Joseph Sparks came in, his beaver upon his head, a corporal escorting him, holding the sleeve of the Friend's coat between his thumb and finger.

He had come, the Friend said, to ask for a permit to pass a barrel of flour through the lines.

"Take off your hat," said Colonel Gorse.

"Nay," said the Friend, "it is against my conscience to take off my hat to any man."

"Damn your conscience!" said the colonel. "Take off your hat!"

"Nay," said the Friend, "I cannot take off my hat."

The orderly, who stood near to the colonel, leaned over and said something to him.

"I don't care a damn who he is," said the colonel in reply to the whispered word. "He sha'n't wear his hat before me. Take off his hat, corporal."

The Friend made no objections as the corporal lifted off his hat and tossed it upon the bench beside the door. "Now then," said the colonel, "tell me your business."

The opening did not seem very propitious, but Friend Sparks began his story again. He had a sister in Chester to whom he had promised a barrel of flour. It should have gone yesterday, but he had put off sending. His sister would be looking for it, and he was sorry that she should not get it. Would the colonel let him send it through the lines by his hired boy that morning.

"Can't your sister buy flour, instead of sending to Brandywine for it?"

"Why, thou sees, friend," said the miller, "money has been very scarce with us of late. My sister's husband is on a voyage to the West Indies, and she looks to me to help her in these matters, so, if thou'll let me, I'll send that barrel of flour this morning."

Once more the orderly whispered in the colonel's ear. Perhaps he told the chief officer that Joseph Sparks was one of the richest men in that part of the country. The two held a muttered talk for a few minutes, and then the colonel turned abruptly to the Friend with more respect in his voice than he had shown before.

"What time did you want to send that flour?" said he.

NO SUCH THING.

The quality of endurance of or indifference to what in other men produces shock or repulsion is said to belong to men without nerves. There is no such thing and cannot be. The finer the physical development the keener perhaps is the sensibility to pain. Let neuralgia put on its harness for a raid and get after such men, the nerves will be found all quivering at once. And so this malady works, a creeping, ugly foe to health bent on torture and misery, until it meets its antipathy, St. Jacobs Oil, which cures and conquers, quickly, surely.

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

A Bank Failure.

AN INVESTIGATION DEMANDED.

A general banking business is done by the human system, because the blood deposits in its vaults whatever wealth we may gain from day to day. This wealth is laid up against "a rainy day" as a reserve fund—we're in a condition of healthy prosperity if we have laid away sufficient capital to draw upon in the hour of our greatest need. There is danger in getting thin, because it's a sign of letting down in health. To gain in blood is nearly always to gain in wholesome flesh. The odds are in favor of the germs of consumption, grip, or pneumonia, if our liver be inactive and our blood impure, or if our flesh be reduced below a healthy standard. What is required is an increase in our germ-fighting strength. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery enriches the blood and makes it wholesome, stops the waste of tissue and at the same time builds up the strength. A medicine which will rid the blood of its poisons, cleanse and invigorate the great organs of the body, vitalize the system, thrill the whole being with new energy and make permanent work of it, is surely a remedy of great value. But when we make a positive statement that 98 per cent. of all cases of consumption can, if taken in the early stages of the disease, be CURED with the "Discovery," it seems like a bold assertion. All Dr. Pierce asks is that you make a thorough investigation and satisfy yourself of the truth of his assertion. By sending to the World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y., you can get a free book with the names, addresses and photographs of a large number of those cured of throat, bronchial and lung diseases, as well as of skin and scrofulous affections by the "Golden Medical Discovery." They also publish a book of 160 pages, being a medical treatise on consumption, bronchitis, asthma, catarrh, which will be mailed on receipt of address and six cents in stamps.

DEFUNCT TOWNS.

Cities and Towns Which Have Been Deserted.

RUINS OF THRIVING VILLAGES.

Wrecks in the Path of Railroads—Fate of "Boom" Towns in the South and West.

Americans have lived fast. Already they have a yesterday and—ruins. Whole cities in this country lie roofless and tenantless; roofless save for the universal canopy, tenantless save for the fox and the coyote. Deserted towns, like the camp fires of a retreating army, mark every step of the westward movement. Searching New England gales and the sweep of wild prairie winds pile the snow upon abandoned hearths.

Above the loam of Indian village towns of white settlers have been built and wiped out and rebuilt. They have flourished and waned among the mounds of the Ohio Valley, and again the ancient habitations of the mound builders have been left undisturbed. They have followed the buffalo trails through the new West until the railroads came along and they disappeared. In the wake of the miner they crept over the sides of the mountains and dotted the deserted claims with their ruins. On the very slopes of the Pacific there are decaying towns whose past was only yesterday.

Oklahoma cities arose in a night, but Kansas towns were depopulated in a day. That was an attractive picture a few years ago when the new Territory was thrown open to settlement and in twenty-four hours Kingfisher lifted itself from the sagebrush a full-fledged city, with a mayor, a municipal government, a bank, a daily newspaper, and thousands of canvas houses. But on the reverse side of the picture were a dozen villages of southwest Kansas whose people left their drought-smitten and mortgaged acres, and with their wooden homes on wheels set out in a body for Oklahoma Territory.

The history of the deserted town is full of homely tragedies. Sometimes the tragedy which wrecked the community has been a feud of long standing; sometimes it has been the clash of hostile commercial interests; sometimes it has been the rascal enterprise of a real estate concern; sometimes it has been a great natural calamity, a cyclone, a blizzard, a landslide, the repeated failure of crops by grasshoppers or drought. There are dozens of causes and each of them has had victims and will have them again, for chapters are still writing in "The Deserted Village."

The famine-stricken corn belt of Kansas and Nebraska will add to the story before spring comes. It has done it before. The pine woods of the Northwest never fail with their summer quota of lumber towns wiped out by fire. Several of the big cities of Washington State have lost 40 per cent of their population in the last two years, while smaller communities have disappeared. It is the tale of the old world retold in the new. For the earth's surface is a palimpsest, and men write their own scrawls over the erasures of their fathers.

Extinct communities are found in New England, Pennsylvania, Virginia, the Carolinas, Tennessee, Georgia, Louisiana, southwest Arakansas, northeast Texas and inparts of Indiana, Illinois and the far Northwest.

Pithole in Western Pennsylvania is perhaps the most conspicuous ruin in this country. Thirty years ago it had a population greater than Pompeii, a dozen hotels, two railroads, and industries which paid out millions of dollars every month. To-day the plowshare has been dragged over the streets which re-echoed the traffic of 30,000 residents; the house sites are pasture lands, and trees and underbrush have sprung from the wine cellars of the hotels. The big church on the hill still stands and the Bilbe lies open in the silent pulpit. But no sexton rings the bell, and no worshipers throng the aisles; and everything else in Pithole is simply a memory.

The city's life was short and intense. Oil was discovered in December of 1864, and in one month a farm became a city. The oil beagn to fail in 1866 and a terrible fire did the rest. And Pithole is only one Pennsylvania ruin. Deserted derricks lift their unsightly black frames all over the oil district, and more than fifty abandoned communities mark the history of the petroleum industry in the Keystone State.

Little shanty towns have come and gone as mining shifted in the great coal fields of the State. Several villages have been deserted because their foundations were undermined by the extensive coal galleries which undermined the earth and opened dangerous cracks in its surface. It was not long ago that a freight train dropped out of sight through the earth at Hazleton.

Up among the rocky hillside farms of New England are the wrecks of towns abandoned like the farms which surround them. Their origin and extinction mark the transition period in Down East life. The early colonists avoided the valleys in fear of malaria and reared their homes on the lofty ridges. But when the railroads were put through the level valleys became their highways and the villagers on the hills had to relinquish their stone dwellings for a residence in the bottoms. The foxes returned to their habitations.

Many of the deserted settlements along the shore line of the South were of colonial origin, and few of the oldest colonial towns are now occupied. Jamestown itself is but a memory. In Tennessee and throughout the mountain district of Georgia and Alabama some lamentable history has been making in the last three or four years. The records of the panic of 1893 tell of the sale of whole towns to satisfy mortgages.

Fort Payne, Ala., which, in 1889, was plotted out for a city, was offered at auction not long ago. In six years $5,000,000 of New England capital had been sunk in the new town. A railroad, extensive manufacturing plants, a hotel which cost $150,000 and fine modern houses were all put up under the hammer but failed of a purchaser; to-day $50,000 perhaps would buy the entire property. Suicide and insanity marked the decay of the ambitious project and now the squatter of Lookout Mountain has taken residence in the empty mansions and stabled his mule in the cofmortable dwellings.

For generations the Mississippi has been eating into the banks on his southern stretches and driving back the shackly river towns. The site of many an Arkansas village lies in his muddy bed and its remains have been rolled down and packed away in the delta ooze at his mouth.

Sometimes abandoned communities stood for the heartbreak of one man whose darling enterprise they were. Ole Bull once founded a settlement in Potter county, Pa., amid mountains which reminded him of his own Norway crags. He acquired 125,000 acres of land and induced eight hundred of his countrymen to locate there. Three towns, Oleana, New Bergen, and New Norway, were laid out, when the great violinist discovered that his funds were exhausted. When he returned from his money-making tour it was to learn that his deed was fraudulent and that he had no valid title to the land which he had purchased. The rascally real estate agent attempted to poison him, and finally the settlements disbanded. Ole Bull never occupied the castle on the hill where he had hoped to spend the last years of his life.

In Sullivan county, Penn., Peter Armstrong, a wealthy Second Adventist of Philadelphia, established the community of Celestia shortly before the civil war. But on his death the enterprise broke up and the town is now without inhabitants.

Fifteen years ago Marquis de Mores founded in the heart of the Bad Lands, in North Dakota, the City of Medora. He built extensive packing houses, laid out streets and business blocks, and sought to capture the trade of the Chicago stock yards. Soon the new community became the rendezvous for the most lawless characters of the Northwest. Cattlemen demanded exhorbitant prices for their stock, and the freight charges for salt were so heavy that hides could not be preserved. In the end a gang of desperate cow-punchers besieged the Marquis in his own castle, but they were beaten off and he returned to France.

The buildings have been left to rot behind him, and, while Medora remains the county seat of Billings County, no court is ever held there and no business transacted. The Bad Lands, one vast catacomb as they are, where the bones of dead creatures of past ages lie scattered, have swallowed up the life of the young city. In the same region was the thriving town of Sentinel Butte, but long ago it was surrendered to the wolves and coyotes. The jungle had been let in.

Nauvoo, on the east bank of the Mississippi, in Illinois, was less than two generations ago the capital city of the Mormons. It had a population of 15,000, the $1,000,000 temple of white limestone and the massive "House of Joseph." Here Joseph Smith had his "revelations" authorizing polygamy, and here he reigned as a prophet under a State charter which granted his community its own courts and its own militia. But in 1844 the mob rose and massacred Joseph Smith, and in 1847 the Mormons were forced to emigrate to Utah. A colony of Icarians succeeded them, but they departed for Iowa, and now Nauvoo is a straggling country town with a population of scarcely 1200 and an imperfect tradition of past splendor.

Beyond the Mississippi many of the new towns of the Kansas-Nebraska region have had a hard struggle for existence. Where forts have been posted on the frontiers of civilization communities grew up. But as the outposts of savagery have been pushed back the forts have been dismantled and new barracks reared further west. The towns, left to their own resources, have often melted away. Instances of this losing grapple with the wilderness are For Washita, in Indian Territory, and Forts Bellknap, Davis and Griffin in Texas. In southwest Kansas courthouse fights have been conducted with the bitterness and lawlessness of communities consciously engaged in a death struggle. With few natural advantages to support a population, the loss to a town of its county records is often a fatal blow. To secure these records, and the general business which they represent, the residents of a rival town sometimes come over in a body and bring their rifles along. Blood flows about the public square before the fateful papers are captured or surrendered. A year afterward the traveler may discover no trace of the old county seat except perhaps one substantial building standing in the midst of the prairie—the dismantled courthouse.

There have been instances of citizens buying up all the property of rival towns, moving the houses and inhabitants into their own community and turning their stock to pasture upon the abandoned sites. The drought and the cyclone following at each other's heels have aided the wilderness in reclaiming its own. In the struggle to make Kansas a free State a number of historic villages were colonized which have long since become memories.

Sumner, in Eastern Kansas, had a population of 2000 people in the fifties, and was for several years the home of Senator Ingalls and also of Minnie Hauk. But the town of Atchison arose near by, and with the exodus of her citizens Sumner declined. Then a cyclone came up from the southwest and wiped out the entire village. Jonathan Lang, the oldest inhabitant, was for years the only resident of Sumner. He used to elect himself Mayor and maintain his official dignities by raising melons and jugging for catfish. Last fall the site of Sumner was converted into a cornfield, and its seal was surrendered to ex-Senator Ingalls.

The chief factor in the destruction of Western towns has been the railroads. It is usually its interest and frequently its policy when it lays out a route to avoid an old town and establish a new community of its own some miles away, selling the lots at any prices it finds profitable. The inevitable result is the decay of the old town and the practical demolition of its property investments. Throughout the Southwest the struglge has been going on for decades between the settler towns and the railroad towns, and it has contributed to the bitterness of the agrarian movement in politics and accentuated the organized attack on corporate enterprises.

Less than a year ago the citizens of Enid, in Oklahoma Territory, were in arms against the Rock Island road because it refused to stop its trains at their station. Although Enid was the county seat, the road had a town of its own several miles beyond which it was trying to build up. The lavish display of rifles and dynamite on the part of the citizens of Enid had the intended effect. The train schedule was altered, and the little city was saved.

Just across the North Dakota line in Manitoba lies the ruins of a tenantless city, which is one of the tragedies of railroad building. Between 1878 and 1881 real estate schemers sedulously cultivated the rumor that the Great Northern was to pass the Red River of the North at that point, and so they laid out the city of West Lynne. Lots were sold at auction in Chicago as high as $5000 each. A $200,000 steel bridge was thrown across the river and handsome brick blocks were erected, one of them costing $85,000; manufactories were started and luxurious residences completed.

And then—the Great Northern passed by and adopted the Pembina route.

West Lynne will hold a population of 15,000 people, but it is absolutely without an inhabitant. The houses are falling to pieces and dense shrubbery is choking yards and streets. Since 1880 it has been the property of a Kentucky syndicate.

At the other end of the Great Northern the population of Fairhaven, Wash., President James J. Hill's favorite town, has dropped from 6000 to 1500 in less than a year.

When the railroads made new highways across the States east of the Mississippi scores of what were once flourishing towns in Ohio fell into slow decay, languishing, as they were out of the beaten track of traffic. Once commerce moved across the old State roads and thriving communities dotted the path of the mail stage and the peddler's cart. These were the stage towns.

Other towns lined the banks of the canals, and the slow procession of moving barges, drawn by plodding mules, kept the life-blood circulating in these commercial centers. Then came the railroads, and the water was let out of the canal locks and the old road houses were turned into dwellings and ranges. Stage towns and canal towns are still dwindling away, and an atmosphere of somnolent quiet pervades the crumbling little communities every day of the week except market day. The value of real estate has shrunk steadily, while the number of mysterious fires is a subject of frequent investigation by the insurance companies.

Hindustan was once the capital of the adjoining State of Indiana, before it was admitted to the Union. But the town has utterly vanished from the postal guide, from history and from the map of the country.

"The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be." There are communities now asleep which will awake when new highways are opened or hidden treasures laid bare in the earth beneath them. Some of the great cities of the West at the head waters or confluence of rivers occupy the sites of ancient Indian settlements. Successive towns have arisen from the same spot in the short span of this century.

The Colorado town of Julesburg, on the old overland route to the California gold fields, is typical of the rapid changes of the far West. In thirty years there have been three Julesburgs. The miners founded the first one in 1864, and the Indians wiped it out the following year, massacring sixty of the inhabitants. The second Julesburg arose late in 1865, when the Union Pacific reached that point, and Fort Sedgwick was established as a military post. The town soon had a population of 6000 people, with several hundred saloons and a theater having a seating capacity of 2000. It was a disorderly community and a large part of the citizens died with their boots on.

But the Union Pacific pushed ahead toward the Coast and the military post followed it. Julesburg broke up rapidly, and its portable structures went to help form the new cities of Cheyenne and Laramie, in Wyoming. In 1871 nothing was left but a few dugouts and storm cellars. But in 1884 a band of Eastern farmers rebuilt the town and it is again thriving.

Sometimes the traveler in southwest deserts sees lifted up in the shimmering air of the hot noon day the image of a river, and on its banks towers and vague battlements. As the apparition is withdrawn into the bosom of the clouds he exclaims, "The mirage!" But the native corrects him: "It is a lost city."—C. F.

VISITING CARDS.

The Process of Engraving is Elaborate.

IT IS VERY MUCH LIKE ETCHING.

The Preparation of Monograms, Crests and Address Lines—Use of Acids and Diamond Points.

How few, though, understand the difference between an engraved visiting card and one printed from type! A very general expression heard at the engravers' shop from customers is "to strike off" such a number of cards, and they are suprised to learn when they have bought no plate that such a thing is necessary; so says the Washington "Star."

In many respects the printing of an engraved card is very similar to the printing of etchings, steel engravings and other pictorial subjects made on plates of metal. The pictures or impressions from these latter are in minute relief. That is, the ink lays on the paper like sand on sandpaper, and this relief is the cause of much of the softness and beauty of the pictorial subject, for notwithstanding the minuteness of the relief of the lines and dots of ink above the surface of the paper they each cast a shadow, and the blending of the real lines and dots with the shadows creates an effect that cannot be attained in any other process.

If one desires to use engraved cards and has no plate, a plate will have to be engraved. After an order for such has been left at a shop, it is sent, with instuctions as to the style of lettering and such other details, to the engraver. This artisan sits, usually, at an adjustable sloping table placed before a window—one that opens to the north, if possible. The implement most used is a graver, which is a little bar of hard steel, generally of a triangular shape, fitted in a handle and sharpened at the end, obliquely, to a point of requisite fineness. Then there are a number of subordinate tools, such as tiny double-pronged forks of different widths, for marking parallel space lines on the plate, T squares, burnishers and scrapers, all used either to prepare the plate for the work of the graver or finish it up after that tool has been used. Copper and steel plates are used, the former about sixteenth of an inch in thickness and the latter about double that thickness, and these are procured from the manufacturers in nearly finished condition, and are furnished in certain sizes.

When an engraver is given an order to execute, say for a visiting card, he first takes a copper plate that will suit the size of card selected, rubs down the surface with charcoal and oil and then buffs it bright with a felt buffer. Upon the now highly polished surface he slightly scratches, with a quill or pointed stick of wood, a sketch of the required named backward, as all such work must be in reverse on the plate. With the little forks he scratches next guide lines for the width and slant. Aided by a magnifying glass, supported in a frame he proceeds to cut into the plate with a graver the name he has previously sketched in. This is very delicate work and easily shows the skill of an expert in the beauty and firmness of the lines and curves and in the formation and joints of the letters.

The ruling machine is a delicately adjusted piece of mechanism for producing tints to imitate the flat wash effects in drawings. The fine, close parallel lines that make up the skies in an engraved picture, the background of a portrait or the shading of lettering and fancy work in a letter heading are done with a ruling machine. Nearly all fine engravings have some ruled tints upon them, and others are almost entirely of these ruled lines, as, for example, the steel engraved pictorial calendars so frequently seen of late on office desks.

These tints are made by a diamond point drawn over the plate by the machine, moved by hand. The plate has been first coated on both surfaces with an acid resisting wax, and the diamond cuts through this coating and exposes the surface of the plate in many fine lines. In order that the later may have depth enough in the plate to hold ink, chemistry is resorted to—that is, the plate is subjected to a bath of diluted acid which cuts into the parts of the waxed plate exposed by the diamond.

This whole operation of coating with wax, ruling and biting with acid may be several times repeated, with resulting effects of cross hatching, deeper tints and the like. In most instances before this ruling has been done the greater part of the hand work has been either engraved or etched with the aid of acid into the plate. After the final retouching by the engraver with his instruments the finished plate goes from his hands to the printer.

Like the engraver, the printer may be, according to his abilities and ambitions, either in expert or merely a skilled workman, but in any case he is one who must exercise extreme care in his occupation, or the easily damaged plates he handles will quickly be telltales of his bungling.

For printing from engraved plates a platen press is used. It is made up of, first, a bed or slab of iron, upon which the engraved plate rests, and this bed is supported between two iron rollers or cylinders—a large one on the under side and a smaller polished surfaced one at the top of the rollers are supported in an iron frame, at one side of which is a large wheel or set of radiating arms, worked by hand, for turning the small roller, the revolution of which moves the press bed with its engraved plate under the roller and by pressure against the plate makes the impression.

The frame is supplied with screws for regulating the pressure of the small roller against the bed. Platen presses differ in some respects according to make an improvement in pattern, but the foregoing description is substantially true of all. For ordinary commercial printing none of the presses is large. The bed reaches about to the printer's waist, and the press does not exceed a couple of feet in width.

The pressure necessary to bring all the ink out of the lines of the plates on to the paper having been exactly determined, the printer begins making the impressions. On more modern makes of presses, the plate, with its underlays, is kept in a stationary position on the press bed, without being lifted from the inking slab to the bed, as in the old way. The plate is "filled in" either with a roller made of soft textile material thoroughly coated with an ink composed of a mixture of dry color, oils and dryers, or the ink is daubed on with a dauber of similar material to that of the roller. In either way, the plate is quite coated over with the ink. With a soft roll of cheese cloth the printer dexterously wipes off the ink from the surface of the plate, so that none is removed from out of the lines, and then, with the hand alone and a little whiting, quickly polishes away the stains left by the oily ink. The paper is then laid upon the plate. Girls usually do this, and are called feeders. The wheel at the side is then revolved by the printer, sending the press bed, with the plate and paper, under the roller. Moderated by the "backer" on the roller, the pressure, to a certain extent, drives the fiber of the paper down into the engraved lines containing the ink which adheres to the paper after it is removed from the plate.

The whole operation of filling, wiping and polishing the plate and printing each impression separately is continued until the order is completed. Expedition is gained on modern presses by a quicker movement of the bed in going under the roller and in its being brought back to its former position automatically. The impressions being in relief are easily smirched and have to be carefully laid aside in rows to permit the oily ink to dry. Etchings and the like which require artistic development previous to the pulling of the impression, such as the making of tints and high lights on the surfaces of the plate by the printer himself are best done on the old-fashioned presses of slow movement.

The monograms, crests and address lines that are so much used on correspondence paper nowadays are also usually made in shops where plate printing is done, as the two arts are closely allied. Combinations of letters making the personal monograms or the address lines as they appear on letter paper are engraved most usually on little blocks of steel called dies in a way similar to engraving on a plate. Crests and coats of arms are best when sunk into the die. That is, the engraver, after first cutting or etching the rudiments of the design in the metal, sinks it deeper by beating into it with a hard steel punch, and afterward retouching the design with the graver. This method in the resulting impression presents a very high relief and beautiful finish. Some engravers make a specialty of sinking dies and do no other kind of engraving.

Stamping from dies is an operation quite dissimilar to plate printing. The press used for the purpose is small, but massive, and rests on a stoutly built bench. The die is held engraved face downward, fastened in a little movable steel case that fits in a groove at the lower end of a vertically supported, short steel bar, which transmits to the die a stamping movement, received by the bar being struck on its upper surface by the downward revolution of an upright steel screw, operated by hand. The die is drawn upward away from the paper, after the impression is made by a set of powerful springs.

Like plate printing this process necessitates an abundant use of ink, a very small quantity of which appears in the impression on the paper.

Perfect relief in a stamped impression is attained by using a counter die, made by glueing bits of straw board or card on the flat surface of an iron slot immediately under the die, which, when struck by the die, becomes a permanent relief impression, which presses the thin sheet of correspondence paper up into the die whenever an impression is made. The pressure is thus exerted in two directions. The paper counters require to be trimmed with a band knife to suit the exact proportions of the design on the die, otherwise the paper becomes bruised around the impression when stamped.—N. Y. KNEW WHEN HE HAD ENOUGH.

A certain Senator who has a reputation for making long-winded speeches was holding the floor Tuesday, when a certain other Senator got up in his seat and slowly wended his way out of the Senate Chamber, evidently to escape the speech.

"Why don't you stay and listen to your confrere?" a friend asked jokingly of the Senator, as he came into the lobby.

"My constituents did not send me here to do penal servitude," was the reply, as the Senator shuffled his way along the corridor toward the restaurant. And he said it without a smile. —Washington Star.

BOOK-BINDING.

Short Talk on the Wonders of the Craft.

PATIENCE AND SKILL DISPLAYED.

Old Dilapidated Books Made to Look as Good as New—An Art Which Appeals to the Eye.

Here is a volume of "Gulliver's Travels," an early edition, with the s's all like f's, and each page tailed with a catch-word, and there is "Johnson's Lives of the Poets," yellow and brittle at the edges. They are jostling against a littered pile of other books in a corner of a great, low-hanging, gloomy room at the top of one of Chicago's lesser office buildings. In front of them stands a peaceful-faced man, with flowing gray hair and beard, and he lifts the Gulliver in his hand with all the tenderness of a book-lover. Carefully raising one cover, he tells about his treasure:

"Half levant, marbled paper, silk-finished inside, and tooled in gold, with bossings of red. Gilt top."

"What is the print? asks the visitor.

The old man looks up quickly, as if surprised.

"Iv'e never looked inside, he says. Then, as if all the tales of the Liliputians and the land of Brobdingnag were of the smallest possible account, he tells about the extra fly leaves, dear to the book-lover, and shows how carefully the binding has been done.

For the old German is one of the best known binders of valuable books in the land. And he is also a true lover of books, only he loves their outsides instead of their insides. He knows that it has taken patience and skill, even genius, to make the insides, but it has also taken patience and skill and genius to make the outsides. They are only different varieties of art, and he loves that which appeals to the eye and furnishes a foretaste of what is within. To him libraries are not collecltons of literature, but exhibits of bindings—an art for the eye rather than a tonic for the mind.

And the long, gloomy room, with its books everywhere, and the girls cleaning and sewing, the men "forwarding, 'finishing, and tooling, and the old binder directing and watching everything, is a wonderful place. This is not alone because the processes are interesting in themselves, but for the memories which cling around the whole art. It was once the profession of men high in public esteem, the confidants of kings, of priests learned in all the arts, and to day only a few men in the world can do really beautiful work. They are the disciples of Grolier and Roger Payne and other great binders of the past.

But binding such as the old German does is not the cheap cloth casing for a "Trilby, nor the flashy paper cover of a "penny dreadful. That is all the work of machinery, and the men who pull the levers or feed the folding devices know little or nothing of the true art of book-binding. They are only parts of the machine, and they take no such interest in the work, nor do they put such individuality into it as do the binders in the old German's shop. A book-fancier can tell by a close examination of a volume just what shop it came from. Perfect imitation is almost impossible as it is in the art of painting.

The old German knows only leather bindings—leather and boards, which are the direct descendants of the ivory, silver and wooden binding of half a dozen centuries ago. The skins used are all imported in big bundles from Europe and Morocco. The levant, or the finest goatskin, costs about $65 a dozen; the Morocco, next in grade, costs from $28 to $34 a dozen; calfskin of the best varieties, now much used for fine work, is sold for from $24 to $30 a dozen, and the cheap grades of "roan, or sheepskin, come at $12 a dozen. In the big pile of skins under the old German's desk there are all the beautiful, rich colors so much prized for rare and valuable books. These and the marbled and otherwise colored papers, twine for sewing and gold leaf, constitute the entire stock of the binder.

When the books come in, mostly dilapidated volumes for rehabilitating, or ancient bindings for repairing, they are corded up in huge piles, each with its label. It is a slow process, and the pressure of work is so great that it is sometimes many months before the books make their way around the shop and finally return looking bright and new and beautiful, to another table not far away.

When the book comes in it goes first to a girl, one of a row sitting at the end of the long room. Here, if the binding is to be entirely replaced, the old corners are cut off and the sections are cut apart by means of knives. The edges are then scraped clean of glue and paste, the girls being dextrous in their employment. As soon as this work is complete a small boy appears and bears the detached sections, all arranged according to pages, to a huge press like a giant letter-press, where they are submitted to great pressure to smooth out the wrinkles and make them compact and solid.

They are then carefully carried to an iron machine—the only one in the shop—where a number of circular saws revolving on a shaft cut small grooves in their backs. These are for the sewing threads.

The sewing girls next take the books and place them on a wooden frame strung with vertical cords which exactly fit into the grooves. The sections are sewed, in and out, their full length, and fastened to the cords. In cases where the book is made up of single leaves they are sewed up into sections before they go to the frame.

Next a boy, aproned to the throat, slaps on the fly sheets, and then the book is ready for the "forwarders."

The old German looks on the real book binders, the "forwarders" and "finishers,' almost as his sons. He took them when they were boys, and they have grown up with him, learning the art little by little during the twenty-seven years in which he has helped to beautify Chicago book collections.

The forwarders first trim the edges of the book smooth with a knife-jawed machine worked by a lever. The size of the book always equals the size of its smallest page. The boards—a fine variety of tarboard—are now fastened on by stitching them with the binding cords, the ends of which are frayed and glued down. A boy takes them from under the hands of the forwarders and they are placed in a press to remain over night.

The next operation is the producing of the convex curve on the back and the concave face of the volume. This is accomplished by the simple means of pounding the edges with a broad-faced hammer until the proper shape is reached. It now goes again to the press, and the back is left protruding and again pounded until the edges lap over just the width of the boards. It is then strengthened with numerous layers of paper glued on.

The leather has all been cut to the proper size and shape by the old German himself, for this is a most important part of the work. The edges of each piece are whittled down by means of a sharp, short knife working on the surface of a fine whetstone, which sharpens it every time it slips from the leather. The leather is then daubed with a prepared glue and fastened to the book very much as a schoolboy covers his reader with paper. In most books this operation is usually preceded by the addition of head, bands, ornamental appendages of striped vellum, which conceal thefolded-in leather back. The back is made elastic by means of spring cardboard which covers the whole of it and is glued at its edges to the tarboards. Across this, at regular intervals, pieces of string are glued to imitate the cords of ancient buildings. A "half-levant" book is one in which the back and corners are overed with levant and the rest of the surface with paper. A "full-levant" is entirely covered with the leather.

Making marbled edges is an art in itself. The colors to be used are thickened and placed in a shallow basin, then shaken and combed together until they assume the marbled appearance. The edges of the book are dipped into the liquid and then dried. For gilding the edge must be thoroughly smoothed by scraping with steel instruments, then treated with glaire, or diluted egg albumen. Gold leaf is next laid on quickly and then polished away with an agate burnisher, leaving the edge a beautiful gilt.

The book is now ready for the finisher. This is the part of the work which requires the greatest skill and art.

The beautiful designs in gilt and the lettering are all 'tooled." A "tool" is a brass die made in France and shaped like the part or the whole of a design. The portion of the cover to be "tooled" is first painted with glaire, then gold leaf is put on and the heated "tools" are pressed down upon it, leaving the design fixed on the leather. The lettering is put on in a similar way.

Sometimes the insides of the covers are beautifully fitted with silk and tooled. One of the books on which the old German is now working is a volume the fly-leaf of which bears the inscription: "Presented to the New Free Library at Chicago, by Victoria Reg., Balmoral, Nov. 13, 1871." It is being bound in full olive levant, with pink levant inside the covers. The tooling is exquisite.

Sometimes two or three leaves are bound into a good-sized book by adding a great number of fly-pages. Such a one is "A Surprising Narrative of a Young Woman," 12mo, which consists of three yellow, age-worn leaves which the old German has smothered in fly pages and a half-Morocco binding. The book is valued at $75.

Sometimes ancient and very valuable books are brought to the bindery to have their covers strengthened and repaired a little, keeping all the old binding possible. The greatest care is required in handling this class of books. The other day J. W. Ellsworth sent in a little package containing three volumes valued at $1000. Little boxes, Morocco-covered, in the form of a book, with the name tooled on the back, were made for each of them. One book had a Grolier binding—"The Colloquies of Erasmus"—and was printed in black letter type. One of the others was "Piers Plowman," in vellum, and bore the date 1550.

Levant bindings are as expensive as they are beautiful, but men who own rare old books will do anything to preserve them.

A GEORGIA EDITOR'S VIEW OF HELL.

A new expression has been added to the vocabularp of political literature. General and ex-President Harrison is said to be a "receptive candidate." Probably this is a reduction to its lowest terms of the saying that is attributed to the mythical old lady, that she never could endure rye, but now that they had got to making it into whiskey, sometimes her old man could force her to swallow a little of it. A receptive candidate is one, it may be presumed, who could be forced to swallow a nomination if it were thrust upon him.

The circumstance that the gold bugs are not drawing the gold out of the treasury to deplete the reserve and force another issue of bonds seems to escape the notice of the opposition press. It was only when greenbacks and treasury notes were being used over and over again to drain gold out of the treasury and force repeated bond issues that the anti-Administration organs and howlers were perfectly happy, but the President and Secretary of the Treasury having arranged the last bond issue so as to shut Wall Street out of the deal entirely, and the gold reserve being thus kept stable, these vociferous critics and howlers are quiet. Meantime the credit of the government is saved and the business of the country is reassured.

And still another industry is threatened by unforeseen competition. The Chinese are going into politics. It is reported from San Francisco that an organization composed of native-born heathens has been formed and headquarters established. The association affects to actively engage in politics. As the Chinaman is purely a practical being, cherishing no sentiment or principle of political nature, it is easy to guess the sort of activity he will display when he gets his hand on the "machine." One shudders at the slaughter in the price of vote that will ensue when this pauper competition meets the home brand in the polling booth, and prepares to deliver himself in "blocks of five."

The unreasonable enemies of Cleveland's Administration who take delight in daily calling attention to the price at which the last gold bonds were quoted, are silent about the condition of the gold reserve which remains unimpared very near the hundred million limit. They would much prefer to see the gold drawn out of the treasury and hoarded by Wall Street so that it would be necessary to sell more bonds to replenish the reserve, and give them opportunity to deal out demagogy to "the unthinking majority." The fact that in the last bond transaction arrangements were made by the administration to make it unprofitable for Wall Street to draw out the gold and hold it, or ship it to Europe, it is not commented on or approved by the Republican press, yet it is being demonstrated daily that in doing this Cleveland saved the credit of the nation and gave stability to business and did much to bring on better times, instead of precipitating a panic, as he would have done had he followed the advice of his enemies.

The Japanese have no military music and their troops carry no flags. Neither do Japanese soldiers awake or go to sleep to the sound of the trumpet. In all this they show themselves more civilized than those who boast of having taught them civilization. When you come to think of it there is something very childish in the band playing, flag waving and horn-tooting that accompany the military proceedings of the Western world. The last thing a brave or sensible man would do individually is to have his readiness to die for his country proclaimed with music every time he took his walks abroad, or to indicate by affixing a gay streamer to his hat that he was a fighter from Fightville. Why, too, a number of grown men cannot go to bed at certain hour without trumpeting around over it four or five times, is calculated to puzzle the thoughtful civilion. Again, silence is essential to the success of a great many military movements, and certainly it never spoiled any, while flags are always in the way and bandsmen are just so many noncombatants to feed and take care of.

H. C. Adams of Madison, Wisconsin, spent several days in town this week. He is here in the interests of B. J. Stevens, one of the principal owners in the Stevens ditch.

A civil case was on trial in Justice Davidson's Court this week on change of venue from Big Pine, the parties being J. C. Crocker vs. Thomas W. Hill. Quite a number of witnesses were present.

A bushel of corn makes four gallons of whiskey, which retails for $16. Out of this the government gets $3, the railroads $1, the manufacturer $4, the vender $7, the farmer forty cents, and the drinker the delirium tremens.

Edward Trudo of Big Pine accompanied by M. S. Roqua of Oakland, were in town last Monday, returning Tuesday. Mr. Trudo says there are three teams at work hauling borax from Saline Valley to Alvord. Only one boiler has been in use lately, but the plant will be running to its full capacity soon.

Mazourka Canyon.

From present indications there will be much more prospecting in Mazourka canyon and vicinity this year than the preceding year. A few exciting discoveries having already taken place, among them being a $70 nugget found by Messrs. H. P. and Paul Carrier one day last week. The ground is too damp to make working profitable at present, but still there is being some mining done. A good many owners of claims are getting their ground stripped and ready for working as soon as it gets dry. There are about twenty five men there now. No placer gold has been found over the summit of the range yet, very little prospecting having been done there. The east side of the range does not look as favorable for placer gold as the west side, the canyons there being very rough and steep, although gold is found there in quartz. Pat Keys has been working his mine in Beveridge district all winter and has about ten tons of ore on the dump and an immense body of ore stripped in the mine, the ledge varying from four inches to five feet in width; most of the ore assays three to five to forty dollars per ton with some that runs over one hundred dollars per ton. He will work his ore this spring at the Mexican mill. Prospecting in that section of the county this summer will be attended with some difficulty, on account of the scarcity of water, on the summit of the range there are now places on the north side of cliff where the snow lays in drifts two feet deep but will not last very long when the hot weather comes to stay. Bunchgrass is plentiful, and for feed, pack animals can do better there than they can in the valley. Very few locations are yet found further back in the mountains than three miles from the railroad.

Another Good Prospect

Ben T. Williams and W. R. Cameron have located what promises to be a valuable mining property, about half a mile south of the recent rich strike made by F. Fitzgerald and W. Smith, at Modock. No work has yet been done beyond breaking off the croppings and clearing the surface to ascertain the width of the ledge. From five samples sent to the Miners Assay Office at Denver the following returns were received by Mr. Williams yesterday:

		PERCENT.	VALUE.
Sample No. 1—
Gold	7.72		$159.58

The Supervisor Election

A great deal of interest was manifested in the Supervisor Election held in the Fourth District on Tuesday. There were originally three candidates, but Mr. Hunter withdrew, leaving the contest between J. J. Stewart and F. Melzer. The vote stood as follows:

	Stewart	Melzer
Georges Creek	11	25
Lone Pine	59	10
Keeler	8	7
Cerro Gordo	3	4
Total	81	46

Mr. Stewart was elected by a majority of 35 votes. He has had experience as a Supervisor, having served the term preceding that of the late John Wilson, and the interests of his District are certain to receive careful consideration.

Climbing Upward.

M. Moriarity, for the past two year mail clerk on the C. & C., will accept position on the Central Pacific on May 1st. His run will be from San Francisco to Ogden. During his connection with the C. & C. Mr. Moriarity has made many friends by his universal courtesy, and his fellow clerks, as well as the general public will regret his change of base. His new duties will place him in line for a higher position, and all his old friends on the C. & C. hope he will climb to the top of the ladder.—Bulletin

The First Arrest

John T. Jones has been arrested in Carson on a charge of taking $77,000 worth of gold and silver from the Carson mint. Mr. Jones was at once released on $25,000 bail. H. M. Yerington, R. K. Colcord, John Rosser and Leslie Bell are his bondsmen. The complaint was made by N. R. Harris, Secret Service detective. Henry, another suspect, is in San Francisco.

Dated March 14, 1895

The following list of Big Pine people have been in town this week: S. G. George, R. W. Thomas, T. W. Hill, Jas. Cooper, W. H. Unlemyer, E. Spencer, A. K. Eugley, G. Singer, Will Singer, R. Hopson, Mrs. Thos. Callow, Miss. Lena Rinhart, Miss Mattie Wallace, and Louis Joseph.

Esmeralda county appears to be the center of interest at present so far as mining matters are concerned. Some of the best mining properties in the county have been opened up there, and if present indications are not at fault a fair sized boom will strike that section this season.

FARM FIELD AND GARDEN

BARNYARD MANURE.

Important Conditions Which Determine Its Value—How It Is Best Applied.

Barnyard manure is the most important manurial resource of the farm. In many cases the value of the manure obtained in cattle feeding represents largely if not entirely the profit of feeding.

The amount and value of manure produced by different kinds of farm animals may be judged from the following figures, calculated to 1,000 pounds of live weight: Sheep, 34.1 pounds of manure per day, worth 7.2 cents; calves, 67.8 pounds, worth 6.7 cents; pigs, 83.6 pounds, worth 16.7 cents; cows, 74.1 pounds, worth 8 cents, and horses, 48.8 pounds, worth 7.6 cents, basing calculations of value on market prices of commercial fertilizers.

The urine is the most valuable part of the excreta of animals. It is rich in nitrogen and potash, but deficient in phosphoric acid. It should, as a rule, be used in connection with the solid dung, the one thus supplying the deficiencies of the other and making a more evenly balanced manure.

Barnyard manure is a very variable substance. The conditions which determine its value are age and kind of animal quantity and quality of food, proportion of litter and method of management and age. In a given class of animals the value of the manure is determined more by the nature of the food than by any other factor. The amounts of fertilizing constituents in the manure stand in direct relation to those in the food. As regards the value of manure produced, the concentrated feeding stuffs, such as meat scrap, cottonseed meal, linseed meal and wheat bran stand first, the leguminous plants (clover, peas, etc.) second, the grasses third, cereals (oats, corn, etc.) fourth and root crops, such as turnips, beets and mangel wurzels, last.

The deterioration of manure results from two chief causes—fermentation and leaching. The former may be almost entirely prevented by the use of absorbents and preservatives, such as gypsum, superphosphate and kainit and by keeping the manure moist and compact. Loss from leaching may be prevented by storage under cover or in pits. Extremes of moisture and temperature are to be avoided, and uniform and moderate fermentation is the object to be sought. To this end it is advisable to mix the manure from the different animals thoroughly in the heap.

When practicable, it is best to apply manure in the fresh condition. If improvement of the mechanical condition of the soil is the object sought, fresh manure is best for this purpose to heavy soils and well rotted manure to light soils. Where prompt action of the fertilizing constituents is desired the best results will probably be obtained by applying fresh manure to the light soils, although excessive applications should be avoided on account of the danger of "burning out" of the soil in dry seasons. Fresh manure has a forcing effect and is better suited to grasses and forage plants than to plants grown for seed, such as cereals. Direct applications to root crops, such as sugar beets, potatoes or tobacco, often prove injurious. The manure should be spread when carried to the field and not left in heaps to leach. One of the best ways to utilize barnyard manure is to combine it with such materials as supplement and conserve its fertilizing constituents. The best results are likely to be obtained by using commercial fertilizing materials in connection with barnyard manure, either in compost or separately. As is well known, barnyard manure is lasting in its effects, and in many cases need not be applied so frequently as the more soluble and quick acting superphosphates, potash and nitrogen salts, etc.—Farmers' Bulletin.

The Farmers' Institutes.

The season for farmers' institutes is here. Of all plans yet tried Wisconsin's is probably the most successful. There the work is under the direction of the college of agriculture, with a competent superintendent in charge. In some states the state board of agriculture has control, while in others a certain sum is given each county society which is used for institute purposes. But in many places this work, if accomplished at all, must be pushed by a few of the leaders in the community. While it is well to rely largely upon home talent, the best interests of the farmers' institute demand a few speakers from abroad, says American Agriculturist, which advises a short session full of brief pointed papers and free enthusiastic discussion.

Changing Seed Corn.

The introduction of seed from a different locality has often been followed by increased yields, and it is considered good practice to make a change occasionally. However, where the seed corn is carefully selected each season, the same variety can be used successfully for a great many years. Numerous instances are on record where instead of "running out" the same variety grown continuously on the same farm has yielded heavier and become better in almost every respect. Plant only the most vigorous seed from the earliest and best ears is advice that every progressive farmer gives.

Destroying Weeds by Electricity.

Not only has electricity been found serviceable for weed destruction, but the cost is much less than when done by hand labor. With electricity five miles of weeds can be killed in an hour at a very small expense. A brush heavily charged with electricity runs along about eight inches above the ground, and every weed with which it comes in contact, however big and strong, is immediately killed and turns black, as if frozen.

News and Notes.

The 1894 corn crop is as poor in quality as in quantity.

The crop of onion seed is short both in this country and in Europe.

If you want a list or particulars of government land now open to the public for settlement, address "Commissioners Land Office, Department of the Interior, Washington."

The government report makes the average yield of potatoes 62.3 bushels. Last year the yield was 72.2. The quality is fair.

Restoring Run Out Pastures.

The nature and food of our common grasses are not so well understood as they should be. On nearly all soils all of the common grasses that make up the turf of our permanent pastures will in time grow less luxuriantly on account of the decrease in the soil of one element of plant food, nitrogen. These grasses make use of the nitrogen already in the soil, and in time this stock gradually becomes depleted. These plants cannot gather nitrogen. They can only use what some other plants have stored up for them. It is extremely fortunate for the American farmer that he can grow abundantly another class of forage plants which restore to the land more nitrogen than they take from it. Because the clovers make use of the nitrogen of the atmosphere they are particularly suited to restore to the soil this element that has been exhausted by the grasses through long continued growth. As a rule, whenever permanent pastures show signs of failure, through lack of fertility, new vigor may be introduced, if a slight stand of clover can be secured. This, of course, will be of short duration, only a year or two at most, unless it be white clover, but this short growth will be sufficient to leave enough nitrogen in the soil to sustain permanent pasture grasses for several years. If clover can be introduced, the benefit will likely be lasting, as this plant is a perennial.—Rural New York.

Wheat Experiments.

At the Illinois station in 1894, as in former years, it was found that different thicknesses of seeding had less influence on yields of either grain or straw than is commonly supposed. Where a small quantity is sown a larger number of stalks are produced by each stool. One advantage of thicker seeding is that if the season is unfavorable and part of the wheat is destroyed there is greater probability enough will remain.

An interesting fact is that different varieties of wheat differ greatly in size and weight of kernels, making a vast difference in number sown even when a like quantity is sown by weight or measure. At the Illinois station the wheat averaged about 800,000 kernels per bushel, but some varieties had only 600,000, while others had about 1,130,000. At the Iowa station even greater differences were found, the extremes being from 400,000 to 1,184,000 kernels per bushel.

HOW COAL "RUSTLERS" OPERATE.

The Union Pacific has reduced the freight on coal $1 per ton in Nebraska from its Wyoming mines, so that the drought sufferers in the western counties may be better enabled to purchase fuel. The work of coal thieves was a factor in having the rates reduced. Between Kearney and Omaha five cars of coal are lost to the company daily, and at Valley, a coaling station containing at least 200 inhabitants, but five cars of coal were retailed last season, and yet everybody kept warm and had coal in their bins. Coming east one day last week from Julesburg, thirteen wagons loaded with coal were counted in a distance of twenty-two miles, these wagons being loaded with coal which had been thrown off cars while in transit between Julesburg and Brule. In fact, this coal stealing has become a business, and so expert have the "rustlers" become that a conviction is next to impossible. A "rustler" gets on a train, say at Julesburg, and during the night throws off coal along the road which is piled up by teams between certain stations. The trainmen make but little objection to a "rustler" throwing off coal, even should they catch him in the act, for they realize that many a family is kept from freezing by the coal picked up along the roadway.

"What do you hear from Hiram?" said Mrs. Sunup. "How's he doin' at college?" "I ain't heard nothin' direct," was the reply, "but it come ter me in a roundabout sort o' way thet he is sowin' a good dela of wild oats." "What air ye goin' ter do?" "Hev 'im come home. I wrote him to-day thet ef he was so dead sot on agriculture he might ez well stick to the farm."

WOMEN'S FACES—like flowers, fade and wither with time; the bloom of the rose is only known to the healthy woman's cheeks. The nervous strain caused by the ailments and pains peculiar to the sex, and the labor and worry of rearing a family, can often be traced by the lines in the woman's face. Dull eyes, the sallow or wrinkled face and those "feelings of weakness" have their rise in the derangements and irregularities peculiar to women. The functional derangements, painful disorders, and chronic weaknesses of women, can be cured with Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. For the young girl just entering womanhood, for the mother and those about to become mothers, and later in "the change of life," the "Prescription" is just what they need; it aids nature in preparing the system for the change. It's a medicine prescribed for thirty years, in the diseases of women, by Dr. R. V. Pierce, chief consulting physician to the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, at Buffalo, N. Y. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will cure the chronic inflammation of the lining membranes which cause such exhausting drains upon the system. It cures nervous prostration, sleeplessness, faintness, nervous debility and all disorders arising from derangement of the female organs and functions.

Mrs. JENNIE WILLIAMS, of Mohawk, Lane Co., Oregon, writes: "I was sick for over three years with blind dizzy spells, palpitation of the heart, pain in the back and head, and at times would have such a weak tired feeling when I first got up in the morning, and at times nervous chills.

MRS. WILLIAMS.

The physicians differed as to what my disease was, but none of them did me any good. As soon as I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, I began to get better; could sleep well nights, and that bad, nervous feeling and the pain in my back soon left me. I can walk several miles without getting tired. I took in all three bottles of 'Prescription' and two of 'Discovery.'"

"About nine o'clock," said Friend Joseph.

"Well," said the colonel, "have it ready by nine o'clock and I will let it go through the lines."

So at nine o'clock a cart half full of straw stood in front of the door at the south mill, with a pretty, pale faced boy standing at the horse's head. The miller and his foreman lowered a great double barrel by a block and tackle from the loft above. Two or three soldiers were standing in the rain with their cloaks over their shoulders, idly watching the operation. ..., did not see three augur holes in the top of the barrel. As it touched the ground Friend Sparks carelessly threw a bag over the top of it.

"That 'ere is the biggest barrel of flour that ever I see," said one of the men, taking his pipe out of his mouth.

"It's a double barrel, friend," said the miller, brushing his hands together. "It is the kind that we used to send to the West Indies."

"Where be that going?" said the soldier.

"To Chester," said the miller briefly. "Now then, John, easy." They turned the barrel on its side, and rolled it slowly up the plank to the cart.

"You roll it up as if it was full of glass," said one of the soldiers. "Let me help you."

"Never mind, friend," said the miller. "We can handle it better without thy help. So—now, John—that's it," and the barrel was rolled into the cart and fastened in its place with ropes. The soldiers did not notice that it lay upon its side, the end nearest the head of the cart raised a little higher than the other.

As they went by Colonel Gorse's headquarters the orderly who had befriended Friend Joseph stood at the door. A young, boyish looking lieutenant wrapped in a cloak sat upon a horse near by, and two troopers and a corporal stood beside him, the muzzles of their guns pointed downward, the flintlocks sheltered from the drizzly rain under their overcoats.

"Is this the barrel of flour?" said the orderly, peering into the cart.

"Aye," said Friend Sparks, "that is it."

"It is a plaguy big one," he observed.

"It is easier to send it in such bulk," said the miller.

"These men are going to Chester," said the orderly, pointing to the young officer and the three troopers. "They will see you safe through."

His words fell upon Friend Sparks like a thunderbolt. His mind seized upon everything in one instant of flight. Those few words meant either death to the wounded man, who would have to stay five hours in the barrel—a dreadful death, cramped and tortured in the narrow space—or else, should the secret of the contents be disclosed, imprisonment for himself and perhaps for his niece. He looked at Mattie, but she kept her head turned away and made no sign.

"Forward!" said the young officer, and off they moved, he riding in front and the three men marching beside the cart.

The miller stood looking after them until they had passed beyond the crest of the hill.

"Are you sick, Mr. Sparks?" the orderly asked, looking into his face.

"Nay," said the Friend with a start, "but I feel chilly. I think I'll go home."

Mattie had heard the words as well as her uncle, and as she rode along, unheeding the rain and rough shaking of the cart, her thoughts teemed like a hive of bees, planning and planning as to how she should leave her precious burden at Cousin Jane Penny's house. She made up her mind at once that, should they pass it by, she would confess to the young lieutenant. For imprisonment in the hulks was better than the chance of death in the long ride to Chester.

About two miles from the town there is a little brawling stream, then known by the Swedish name of Skillpot, or Stony brook. At the edge of the woods, close to the stream, was a company of troopers, who had been stationed to watch the high road for stragglers from the American army. They had built a rude shelter of fence rails and brushwood beside the road.

As the company came by, one of the sentinels on guard stopped them, and the young lieutenant showed the passes for the cart and its burden.

"Look'ee, Jack," said the soldier, calling to the others. "Here is a chap with the biggest barrel of flour that ever I see. Tell them to fetch the pan and we'll fill it."

For a moment Mattie's head spun dizzily; then she cried out in a shrill voice: "You sha'n't touch the flour. The barrel is not yours. You sha'n't touch it."

"Zounds!" said the man. "Why sha'n't we touch it. Can't you spare a little pinch of flour out of such a big barrel as that?"

"No," cried Mattie passionately. "You sha'n't have it!"

"Let the man have a little," urged the lieutenant.

"No, he sha'n't have it!" she cried more and more vehemently.

Two or three of the others had come forward now, and one stood by with a hatchet in his hand.

"By the Lord Harry!" said the man who had just spoken, "we shall have some, I tell 'ee! Here, Dick," to the other sentry, "hold the boy. Now give me the ax till I knock in the head."

"Let me go!" screamed Mattie, struggling with the fellow who had caught her by the arms and held them behind her back.

"What is the matter there?" said a harsh voice, and Mattie, turning her head, saw an elderly officer wrapped in a cloak standing by the fence beside the road.

"They want to rob me," cried she in a gasping voice, "and they sha'n't do it! They sha'n't do it!"

"What's the matter, my men?" the officer asked, coming forward. One of the soldiers explained, and the officer turned to Mattie with some surprise. "And will you not give the poor man a little of your flour?" said he.

"No," said Mattie, "I cannot."

"But why?" said the officer.

Mattie hesitated a moment, and then a sudden determination came upon her. "I will tell you," said she; "but I cannot tell them."

"Very well," said the officer; "tell me, then." And he led her a little apart to the side of the road. The poor girl hesitated for a moment or two; looked to the right and the left like a hare in the toils, then catching him by the arm and raising herself upon tiptoe she breathed into his ear, "Because I am a poor girl and am trying to save my dear friend, who is a wounded soldier of the American army, and is in yonder barrel."

The officer glared at her silently for a little while; beyond that he neither changed countenance or made a start.

Mattie waited breathlessly to hear what he would say.

Suddenly he turned to the others. "Who gave the order to pass this boy through to Chester?" said he.

"Colonel Gorse," answered the young lieutenant.

Once more the officer hesitated for a moment. "Very well," said he at last, "then let him go."

Mattie gave him one eloquent look of gratitude, and then, without waiting a moment, ran to her cart and clapping the reins rode off as fast as the sober old horse could draw its load.

CHAPTER IV.

"You're drunk," said he. "No, I ain't," said Mattie.

As they climbed the steep hill beyond the brawling stream the young officer reined back his horse beside the cart. "What was the reason you wouldn't give the men some flour?" he said.

"Because I would get whipped," said Mattie, looking up at him with her dark eyes. "Mister Sparks is a quiet man," she added, "but," with a grimace, "when he whips he whips hard."

The young officer laughed aloud. "And that was your wonderful secret, was it?" said he.

"Yes," said Mattie; "I did not want the soldiers to know it for fear they'd laugh at me." Then suddenly, "There is a farm house a mile up the road yonder, and Mr. Sparks told me to stop there for a letter if you'd wait till Mrs. Penny wrote it."

"No," said the young officer. "We make no stops till we get to Chester."

"Very well," said Mattie with a show of indifference, "just as you please. It wouldn't take over fifteen minutes, and she can mull a crock of the best hard cider to be had in the state of Delaware."

The young soldier rode on for awhile in silence. He had been marching in the rain with the three men since daylight that morning. He had had nothing to eat but a piece of bread and meat, and nothing to drink but a cup of lukewarm tea, which he had swallowed in Wilmington. The thought of the mulled cider and the warm rest for a few minutes was alluring.

"Where is the house?" said he suddenly.

"Oh, half a mile or so along the road," said Mattie. "It don't matter if you won't stop. It was only a letter that I was to take if I had gone to Chester yesterday."

The Professional Women's League.

The greatest woman's club in the world, as the professional women call their league, met Wednesday afternoon at 29 West Thirtieth street. Well known actresses in pretty summer gowns sat side by side with women whose faces perhaps were not quite so familiar to the public, but whose gowns were quite as pretty. There was a freemasonry about the assemblage which would have been a revelation to people who think that actresses systematically slander and criticise each other.

It might also have been a surprise to these people to see several scores of women, who are not expected to know anything but their art in its narrowest sense, listen with close interest and attention to a thoughtful and serious paper on music and then discuss it intelligently and critically. The paper was read by Miss Marie Merrick, who selected the piano stool as her point of delivery, so that at any time she could turn to the keyboard to illustrate her words. In this manner she gave examples of the way to produce certain varieties of tone and then excited a good deal of laughter by showing how not to do it.

At the close of the reading her listeners plied her with questions, and little impromptu talks were given by Miss Fannie Gillette and Miss Grace Addison. Miss Katharine Stagg, who was the presiding officer, closed the discussion, and then the company separated into groups, and for an hour conversation flowed at high tide. A reporter found that almost every group was engaged in the discussion of dramatic art, a mighty intelligent discussion, too, with a startling abundance of polysyllables.—New York Letter.

Driven to the Rouge Pot.

Says a correspondent: I lost my complexion very young, grew sallow, and in order to remedy this pumpkinlike mask I took to rouging. It was a success. People began to say: "How well you look! Such a fine color." I pride myself on the fact that I have an exceedingly finished touch. I never left my mirror without giving my face the most careful scrutiny. I learned to shade off the edges until I really believe that my homemade flush was prettier than a good many going the rounds that were perfectly natural, for it never spread over my chin, nose and forehead.

One day I heard a woman lecture on the evils of painting the cheeks. I went home, threw my box of carmine in the fire and resolved that I would be natural at all hazards. In a few days I began to be greeted with commiserating glances. Friends asked if I were ill. "You look so fagged. Must be something the matter." I stood it as long as I could, when back to my rouge I went, and I shall not desert it for anything more natural unless it be to adopt beet juice, which, I hear, is not only a beautifier, but a tonic for the skin as well.

Advice For a Young Woman.

This from an authority, "Don't ask questions, don't mention names, listen occasionally, and you will find yourself a society favorite." The first "don't" seems to have been most correctly placed. There is nothing which creates a pleasanter impression and which really leads to the most complete confidence than the tact which listens sympathetically to all a companion will say, but never probes deeper by an impulsive interrogation. One learns to trust such an acquaintance and feels in her company a peculiar sense of security that is very satisfying.

PUT IT OUT.

What a little spark can do is illustrated by the burning down of Chicago, and the modern apparatus for putting out great fires. The spark, too, enters the human family with devastating effects; hence we hear of so many deaths by accidents with fire among careless cooks and children. This is another field of operation—but a bottle of St. Jacobs Oil is the apparatus to put the fire out of the system. Used according to direction it will soothe, heal, cure, and leave no ugly scar behind. The healing process gives new surface and kindly does its work.

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

One of the Remarkable Achievements of the Science of the Age.

(From the Herald, South Bend, Washington.)

It falls to our lot this week to tell our readers, and especially those who are not blessed with perfect health, of one of the greatest and simplest remedies of the century. Personally we enjoy the very best of health, year in and year out, but among our friends is J. L. Myers, proprietor of the Broadway Pharmacy, a man who knows his business thoroughly, is entirely wedded to chemistry, and hygiene, and often "talks shop." One evening the conversation turned on new discoveries in drugs.

He told us that one of our mutual friends, John Wyandt, a locomotive engineer, owed his health to a new medicine known as Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and that Mrs. Lawler, the wife of Patrick Lawler, cooper at the Tannin Extract Works, and well known in this city, has been raised by them from what her friends thought was her death bed.

Having had our attention called to the matter so particularly, we have since found that everybody has a good word for Pink Pills, and especially were we interested in the case of Mrs. Lawler. Finally we called at her home and asked her to tell us if Pink Pills had really done as much for her as had been told. She said they had, and she would repeat the facts to me.

Mrs. Lawler said: "Two years and a half ago I was taken sick. I then lived in Tacoma, and for five weeks was not able to turn myself in bed. My husband and boys lifted me around and cared for me, and they scarcely hoped for my recovery. I could eat nothing—was simply worn out.

"I sent for the Pink Pills and I began taking them. It said in the directions that they should be taken immediately after eating, so I ate lightly, then took the pills, and in two days was able to sit up. In two weeks I was up and around, and was able to make the trip of 125 miles by cars to South Bend, where my husband had gone to work.

"Since that time I have been well and have done my own work, and now when I feel worn out or ill I always take Pink Pills, and they help me at once. I have in the two years and a half used twenty-one boxes of them, and we all use them when we are feeling out of sorts. I have recommended them to many of my friends, and they always helped them, and I can say to all mothers that they will find them a good medicine to build them up, cure headaches, dizziness, and the ills which so often beset them."

Mr. Lawler also stated that he had often taken Pink Pills. That he used to be troubled with sick headache and dizziness in the morning, but that Pink Pills had cured him.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are for sale by all druggists, or may be had by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., for 50 cents per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

HIS DISCOVERY.

He knew he doted on her, but somehow he wasn't so sure of her that he quite dared to ask her the great question. They were talking about the good things of the world like a pair of children.

"If you had your wish," she said, "of all the things in the world, what would you rather have?"

"You," he responded without a moment's hesitation.

"Oh," she exclaimed, quite upset by his impetuosity. "I don't mean that. I mean something that you haven't already."—Detroit Free Press.

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

AN EAGER AND A NIPPING WIND,

A continuous down pour of rain, inclement weather, generally in winter and spring, are unfavorable to all classes of invalids. But warmth and activity infused into the circulation counteracts these influences and interpose a defense against them. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, most thorough and effective of stomachics and tonics, not only enriches the blood, but accelerates its circulation. For a chill, or premonitory symptoms of rheumatism and kidney complaint, particularly prevalent at these seasons, it is the best possible remedy. It is also invaluable for dyspepsia, liver complaint, constipation and nervousness. Never set out on a winter or spring journey without it. Elderly persons and the delicate and convalescent are greatly aided by it.

That no one will take a fellow's word is not necessary proof that he will keep it.

NERVOUS DYSPEPSIA.

The failure of the nerves of the stomach to perform their functions is the cause of nervous dyspepsia, a most exhausting form of disease. ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are an excellent remedy. Senator James F. Pierce, of New York, writes:

"For the past two years I have suffered very much from an aggravated form of nervous dyspepsia. I have resorted to various remedial agents, deriving but little benefit. A few months since a friend of mine suggested the trial of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. Following the suggestions, I have been using the same with the happiest effects. To those similarly afflicted let me suggest the manner of their use. I place one over my stomach, one over the hepatic region, and one on my back. The effect is excellent. From the day I commenced their use I have been slowly but surely improving, and am quite confident that by continuing I shall again be restored to my accustomed health."

Pure Blood

Is absolutely necessary in order to have good health. The greatest affliction of the human race is impure blood.

There are about 2400 disorders incident to the human frame, the large majority arising from the impure or poisonous condition of the blood.

The best remedy for all blood diseases is found in Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Its remarkable cures are its loudest praise. It is not what we say but what Hood's Sarsaparilla does that tells the story.

No remedy has ever had so marked success, or won such enormous sales.

Scrofula in its severest forms yields to its potent powers, blood poisoning and salt rheum and many other diseases are permanently cured by it. For a general Spring Medicine to remove those impurities which have accumulated during the winter, or to overcome That Tired Feeling, nothing equals

"I wish to say that 3 years ago we had a beautiful boy born to us. At the age of 11 months he breathed his last, a victim to impure blood. On Aug. 4, 1891, another boy was born, who, at the age of two months, became afflicted with the same disease. We believed the trouble was constitutional, and not common sore mouth. I procured a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla and commenced to give it regularly to both mother and baby. Improvement began at once. We have succeeded in eradicating the scrofulous blood from the system, and to-day we are blessed with a nice, fat baby boy, 18 months old—the very

THE DOLL INDUSTRY.

A Chicago Toy Dealer's Most Brilliant Idea.

AN AMERICAN GIRL AS A MODEL.

Ingenious Yankees Make Nearly all the Mechanical Toys of Iron and Tin.

A Chicago dealer in toys was crossing the Atlantic a few years ago on his way to Thuringia, Germany, where most of the world's playthings for children are made. Among the passengers on shipboard was an American lady with her daughter, a bright-eyed, curly-headed 4-year-old. As the child skipped merrily about the deck on pleasant days the dealer thought how much more beautiful and attractive his dolls could be made if they were modeled after such a type of the American child instead of after little Germans and Italians and Parisians. For two or three days the idea kept growing upon him until he finally sought out the American lady and succeeded in obtaining her permission to make a number of photographs of the little girl, showing her curls and her big, laughing eyes. With these he went up into the Thuringian mountains, and it was not long before a clever artist had molded the face in clay and sent it to one of the queer little factories where toys are manufactured. In course of time the dolls' heads were made and shipped across the water, reaching Chicago only a few weeks before Christmas.

The dealer unpacked his treasures and displayed them in his windows—scores of bisque and china reproductions of the face of his little acquaintance on shipboard. When the Chicago children saw that the doll really looked like an American girl the windows were quickly emptied, and by Christmas every one of the heads had been sold. Since that time the dealer has had most of his dolls modeled from real boys and girls, and he could if he chose give their names.

For some reason American manufacturers have been unable to make toys that please the children of this country half as well as those which come from Thuringia. Perhaps they haven't the art of the German peasants, whose fathers and grandfathers before them were toymakers; or, perhaps, the necessary materials are not at hand; or it may be that they simply lack the patience. But, whatever the reason, the Americans, despite the fact that the United States government has protected them with tariffs ranging from 35 to 60 per cent, have been unable to cope with their foreign competitors. Accordingly the wholesale toy dealers are compelled to send to Europe for their dolls' heads, and almost everything else except certain iron and mechanical toys.

Almost everybody in the province of Thuringia is a maker of playthings. There are twenty factories or more, all of them small and quaint, in which dolls' heads alone are manufactured. They employ from 150 to 500 workmen each, the best paid of whom—the artists who make the clay molds—receive only from $15 to $25 a week, while some of the girls who paint eyebrows and rouge the dolls' cheeks draw only 25 or 30 cents a day.

When an American dealer sends over the photograph of the child whose face he wishes reproduced the artist takes it and molds a head of the proper size in clay. Then two plaster casts are made, one of the face of the mold and one of the back, the dividing line running from the center of the top of the head through the point of the shoulders. A core of plaster about half an inch smaller in diameter than the mold is then constructed, to be used in making the cavity inside of the doll's head. The molds being now complete, they are taken to the factory, and a workman presses into one of the halves a piece of potter's clay. Into this he forces the core until it is within a quarter of an inch or less of the mold, according to the desired thickness of the shell of the head. Then a thin layer of clay is spread over the exposed portion of the core and the other half of the mold is pressed down over this and weighed, so that every line and chink in the molds will be filled. This clay is the finest that can be obtained from the famous quarries in Limoges, France, and Bohemia. After it reaches the factory it is mixed with fine sand and coarser German clay, and all the ingredients are carefully pulverized and ground up together.

The clay in the mold having dried thoroughly, the head is taken out and set into a little fire-clay receptacle much resembling a cheese-box. When this is full of heads it is ready for the baking kiln. The process of burning the clay is the most important in the whole work. Only the most skilled men are employed, men who can tell almost by instinct how hot the fires should be and when the heads have been sufficiently burned. The kiln itself is a great fire-clay apartment, which opens off from the factory and is entered through a number of small doors.

When the fire-clay boxes containing all the way from ten to forty "raw" doll's heads have been piled inside the kiln, sometimes to the number of several hundred, the doors are all closed and the heat is started and kept going steadily for about three days and then the furnace is allowed to cool for two days more. If the heat is not kept absolutely even the dolls become stop shouldered or have twisted countenances like those frequently sold on the bargain counters of department stores. When the heads are taken from the kiln they are of a faint amber color and are known as bisque ware.

For ordinary china dolls a coarser quality of clay is used, and after being taken from the furnace the first time they are dipped into a glazing solution and then baked again.

When the heads are thoroughly cooled they are conveyed to a long table at which scores of girls, all gayly dressed and all chattering, are sitting. They range from 13 years of age upwards, the laws of the land not permitting the employment of younger children. The first girl takes the head, and with a deft movement of a brush which she holds in her hands paints the eyebrows and then slips it along to the next girl, who puts the blushes on the doll's cheeks. A third girl colors the hair, another the lips, and then the head is turned over to a more experienced girl, who is charged with the duty of putting in the eyes. She has before her a minature mortar-box full of moist plaster of paris and scores of eyes of different sizes and shapes. When she has found a pair that fits, she fastens them in chinking in the the gaping spaces with plaster of paris, which is subsequently colored. For the "go-to-sleep" doll the eyes are attached by little wires and operated by a simple weight of lead. Long experience has made all the girls extremely deft and rapid in their work, and where they work by the piece they sometimes make as high as 50 cents a day.

The feet and hands of the dolls are molded and baked just like the heads. The cloth for the bodies is cut by a great machine, the knives of which are fashioned in the exact shape of the pieces desired. The sewing is all done by girls, a small place being left in one end of the body for stuffing. The contents are sometimes cork, sometimes sawdust and sometimes hay.

Papier-mache dolls are pressed into form by a hydraulic machine and afterward baked and painted like other dolls. The peasants in the surrounding country also make great numbers of knit dolls of a hundred shapes and hues and they are sold for a few marks a dozen to the factory managers. The hair of dolls for the most part comes from England, where it is manufactured from a variety of flax known as the mohair flax. Some of the more expensive dolls are provided with real hair.

There is a fashion in dolls as well as in everything else. A prominent Chicago toy dealer says that the American trade demands dolls with large open eyes, usually blue, gray or brown, in the order named, and black very rarely. Golden hair is preferred above all others shades. The manufacturers are compelled to make a special doll for the American trade—one that cannot ordinarily be sold in Europe. The dresses also have to be made according to the latest fashions. The dealers actually buy paper patterns of the latest styles and have them sent to Thuringia, where the dressmakers for dolls cut and fit the garments.

Most of the ordinary wooden toys, such as the animals for Noah's arks, are whittled out by the boys and men in the little mountain homes of Thuringia. The whole family often works at the business, one member always making an elephant, another a camel, another a horse, year in and year out. Of course they become very expert, but the pay which they receive is very small.

Before the Franco-Prussian war toy watches all came from Paris, but when the conflict between the two nations broke out the German artisans, who were employed almost exclusively in the watch factories, were driven out. They returned to their fatherland and set up factories of their own, and since that time almost all the toy watch trade of this country has been with Germany.

The ordinary papier-mache masks sold by costumers are made in molds similar to those prepared for dolls, and, while there has been some attempt on the part of American manufacturers to make them, the greatst number still comes from over the water.

But the Americans have driven out all competitors in one branch of the toy trade. No artisans in the world have been able to invent such wonderful mechanical toys of iron and tin, and the exports of this class of work to Europe every year are exceedingly large. All the clever devices sold by street peddlers are the work of ingenious Yankees.

Toy trumpets, musical tops and many metal playthings are made in the quaint old city of Nuremberg. Shell goods come from England. Toy dishes of china are largely the work of workmen in Bohemia. Thus the artisans of almost the entire civilized world are represented in every well-regulated nursery.

THE PAINLESSNESS OF DEATH.

Dr. Cyrus Edson, in the North American Review, says: "Nothing is more common than to hear from the pulpit pictures in words of excitement, of alarm, of terror, of the death-beds of those who have not lived religious lives; yet, as a rule, if these pictures are supposed to be those of the unfortunates at the moment of death, they are utterly false. In point of fact, ninety-nine of every hundred human beings are unconscious for several hours before death comes to them. All the majesty of intellect, the tender beauty of thought, or sympathy, or charity, the very love of those for whom love has filled all waking thoughts, disappear. As a little baby just born into the world is but a little animal, so the sage, the philosopher, the hero, the statesman, he whose thoughts or deeds have writ themselves large in the history of the world, becomes but a dying animal at the last. A merciful unconsciousness sets in as the mysterious force we call life slowly takes leave of its last citadel, the heart, and what is has become what was. This is death."

PARIS LETTER.

The New Presidential Policy to Gain Popularity.

CASIMIR-PERIER IN RETIREMENT.

More Honor in Paris to the Living Disturber of France than to Her Dead Defender.

The French cultivate the worship of heroes with a zeal which would have satisfied the soul of Carlyle. It must be confessed, though, that they choose their idols somewhat incongruously, and are inclined to those with feet of clay. The hero of the hour is M. Henri Rochefort, and I am not exaggerating when I say he may continue to hold the throne for a month, or at least a fortnight. Ever since the collapse of the Boulanger movement, in which he was first lieutenant, M. Rochefort has been exiled in London, from whose foggy but hospitable clime he has continued to edit the brilliant, injudicious, volcanic "Intransigeant."

But the Amnesty bill with which the new government and the new President have inaugurated their reign has opened the ports of France to political refugees, and Rochefort has made a triumphal re-entry into Paris with honors that the first Napoleon might have envied.

Never have circumstances conspired more favorably to show the belief of Parisians in the proverb that a live dog is worth more than a dead lion than they did last Sunday. The morning was devoted to the burial of Marshal Canrobert, the last Marshal of France, the hero of Inkermann, Balaclava, Alma, Solferino, Magenta, Constantine and other renowned battle-fields. The afternoon was occupied in the welome to Rochefort, the aristocrat by birth, the demagogue by chance, the man of all who lashes Paris into fury by his pen and encourages discontent and, if need be, revolt. For the former, who had brought honor and glory to France, and whose only offense was the now almost forgotten one of being a prime mover in the coup d'etat, there was, it is true, a state funeral, but it was grudgingly given and the Chamber was on the point of refusing the grant had not the fear of another ministerial crisis forced the hands of the Deputies. For an amnestied exile the nation could, of course, do nothing, but the populace did obeisance in the afternoon, whereas in the morning they had only whetted their curiosity. M. Rochefort was received at the Gare du Nord by a crowd of about eighty thousand persons, after having experienced an official welcome by the municipal council on landing at Calais. In Paris the crowd wished to drag his carriage through the streets, but were prevented, so the enthusiasm took the form of kissing and the presentation of bouquets. Rochefort drove at once to the "Intransigeant" offices, on the balcony of which he had to appear at intervals of five minutes in order to throw words of comfort to his worshipers and to do a little judicious self-advertising. And now, having almost worn his arms off in the course of a day's handshaking, he is off to Monte Carlo for a taste of the sun before settling seriously down to work. He is about to write a book on England, of which he has many kind things to say, and which he intends to visit every year for a couple of months. But in spite of his liking for the country which gave him asylum he prides himself on the fact that he did not learn a word of English during his years of sojourn there.

It is only by chance that we escaped another Cabinet crisis last week. The French, as every one knows, simply bubble over with patriotism, and they are never more patriotic than when the word England is whispered in their ear. When, therefore, it became known that the late Minister of War had signed a contract with an English shipping firm for the transport of war materials to Madagascar, there was a very lively scene in the Chamber. It was in vain that the War Minister explained that there was only one French firm who would undertake the work of transports, and that at a charge of 400,000 francs more than the English company. M. de Mahy retorted that they must make any sacrifice, and refused to allow England to carry their material even if she offered to do it for nothing. It was only when the Minister of Marine pointed out that beyond the question of expense there was a question of time involved, and that he would not accept the responsibility for any such delay, that the House quieted down and silently agreed to pass on to the next business.

The ex-Premier and Mme. Casimir-Perier are now at the Hotel des Anglais at Beaulieu, where the former is probably ruminating over the promised revelations he is to make and recovering his spirits before again entering the political arena. An interesting and more or less authentic account has been given in a Rouen paper of the immediate causes which led to M. Casimir-Perier throwing up his office without warning. So far as he and those surrounding him at the Elysee were concerned, the resignation was by no means sudden, but had long been contemplated. The then President's grievances were that he was practically ignored by his Ministers, who distributed bills in his name before he had seen them, published a list of decorations as to which he had not been consulted, and semi-officially announced prefectorial promotions of which the President was in complete ignorance. Such were the head and forefront of his troubles, but in addition there were the intrigue of political parties, the scurrilous attacks in the press and the general feeling of mistrust. And so M. Casimir-Perier surprised his countrymen by taking them at their word at an awkward moment and resigning a position in which he felt he had not their confidence.

An amusing story has been going around about the arrest of President Faure by his own sentry. I should be sorry to have to vouch for its truth, as it is too much like many another story we have all heard, even to its pretty sequel. It is said that M. Faure strolled one evening in his garden at the Elysee longer than he had intended, brooding, perhaps, over the cares of office and formulating plans for the conciliation of the reptile press, and when he came to his private entrance he found the sentry hanged. With the replacing of the sentinel had come a new password which had not yet been communicated to the President. The intelligent soldier, who had never seen the President, and who had not studied the illustrated papers or the shop windows, refused to accept the old password and placed M. Faure under arrest as a suspicious character. The sergeant of the guard, it seems, was no better informed, and he, too, refused to listen to the President's explanation. But the officer on duty displayed his superior education by recognizing M. Faure and apologizing profusely for the indignities to which he had been submitted. To which M. le President politely replied, "Not at all," and sent his compliments and a pourboire to the young soldier who had so fearlessly executed his duty. The story, as I have said, is a pretty one, but a generous recognition of a mistake of this kind is apt to create a bad precedent.—Ex-Attache, in Mail and Express.

WOMEN AND THEIR FEET.

Women are much oftener too short than too tall, and they try to gain height by high heels. These do, undoubtedly, as long as their wearers stand still, give dignity; but they are most graceless for walking, even in a room, and deform the feet. Thus they administer to a very-short-lived vanity, and we cannot recommend them. American women have very often the feet too small, and this is no beauty. The better-shaped a foot is the smaller it will look, but that it should really be too small involves an awkward gait. Again, it should be remembered (though it is usually forgotten) that the foot of a large woman should be large—not large in proportion to her size—but it is no beauty that it should be as small as that of a small woman. A heavily built woman should have a larger foot than a slenderly built woman, and usually, to her unnecessary sorrow, she has. The foot should be as long as the ulna, or chief bone of the forearm—that is, from the small head of the bone to be seen at the wrist to the point of the elbow, should be the length of the foot. Where the forearm is too short the foot will be found to be also too short; where this is too long the foot will be too long. Most people are surprised that the foot should be as long as the forearm, and are inclined to dispute the fact till they prove it by experiment; but an experiment will easily show that a straight line drawn from one point to another will appear a great deal longer than the same space filled by a line divided into curves. Large women pinch their feet in tight shoes because they are ashamed of having them in proportion to their bodies, thus in time they deform and swell them until they are out of proportion to their bodies, and in the direction that they did not intend. Small women pinch their feet because they are vain of their smallness, and would emphasize it. Now, it many cases they are not so small in proportion as the feet of tall women; but the public eye, being not critical of proportion, will without their going to the pain of pinching their feet, consider them small because they are abstractedly so; therefore, they seem to us to make a poor exchange for a graceful motion and a dignified carriage—two essentials to the greatest beauty. In fact, anything else had better be sacrificed to ease of motion, and yet this is what one sees most frequently disregarded.

MAN'S STATURE.

Prof. Donath of Budapest has been examining the statistics of European armies with a view to ascertain whether the human race appears to be improving in a physical sense or deteriorating, says the London Daily News. The conclusion he arrives at is that men are decidedly deteriorating. Statistics from Russia he has been unable to obtain, but his conclusion is supported in almost every other case by those from the other countries where military service is compulsory.

In the Austro-Hungarian army the number of men rejected as not coming up to regulation standard of height has increased during the last ten years by no less than 76 per cent. The standard has been lowered in Germany, so that a comparison cannot fairly be made, yet in spite of this in the same period the number of men rejected as too short has risen from 7 to 16 per cent. Taking a period of sixteen years, the increase of men below the proper height in France has been from 6 to 13 per cent., and in Italy, within ten years, the same increase has been from 7 per cent. to no less than 23 per cent. Switzerland alone is an exception to the rule.

Prof. Donath, it is necessary to add, takes the figures as he finds them, and has taken no steps to find out whether, with the great increase of the armed forces of Europe, there has not been a growing tendency to let men off if it can possibly be managed.

"Why did you tell the preacher that you never talked shop on Sunday?" said Spudkins to his friend, a coal dealer. "He asked me if I saw the error of my weighs," replied the latter.

ABOUT NAPOLEON.

Strange Letter He Wrote to Mme. Permon.

THE ONLY RESORT OF BUONAPARTE.

Despair May Have Made Him Willing to Marry a Woman as Old as His Mother.

In the March Century Prof. Sloane's Life of Napoleon reaches the stage of Bonaparte's first entry into Parisian society, at the time just preceding his marriage with Josephine. Prof. Sloane says:

When Gen. Buonaparte reached Paris, and went to dwell in the mean and shabby lodgings which his lean purse compelled him to chose, he found the city strangely metamorphosed. Animated by a settled purpose not to accept the position assigned to him in the Army of the West, and, if necessary, to defy his military superiors, his humor put him out of all sympathy with the prevalent gaiety. Bitter experience had taught him that in civil war the consequences of victory and defeat are alike inglorious. In the fickleness of public opinion the avenging hero of today may easily become the reprobated outcast of tomorrow. What he had gained at Toulon was already dissipated in part; the rest might easily be squandered entirely in Vendee. He felt and said that he could wait. But how about his daily bread?

For a month or more Buonaparte was a mere onlooker, or at most an interested examiner of events, weighing, and speculating in obscurity much as he had done three years before. The war department listened to and granted his earnest request that he might remain in Paris until a general reassignment of officers which had been determined upon, and, as his good fortune would have it, was already in progress, should be completed.

The friendly home of Mme. Permon was almost the only resort of Buonaparte, who, though disillusion, was still a Jackobin. Something like desperation appeared in his manner; the lack of proper food emaciated his frame, while uncertainty as to future left its mark on his wan face and in his restless eyes. It was not astonishing, for his personal and family affairs were apparently hopeless. His brothers, like himself, had now been deprived of profitable employment; they, with him, might possibly and even probably soon be numbered among the suspects; destitute of a powerful patron, and with his family once more in actual want, its head was scarcely fit in either garb or humor for the society even of his friends.

His hostess described him as having "sharp, angular features; small hands, long and thin; his hair long and disheveled; without gloves; wearing badly made, badly polished shoes; having always a sickly appearance, which was the result of his lean and yellow complexion, brightened only by two eyes glistening with shrewdness and firmness." Bourrienne, who had now returned from diplomatic service, was not edified by the appearance or temper of his acquaintance, who, he says, "was ill clad and slovenly, his character cold, often inscrutable. His smile was hollow and often out of place. He had moments of fierce gaiety which made you uneasy, and indisposed to love him."

The story that in these days he proposed for the hand of Mme. Permon, though without any corroborative evidence, has an air of probability, partly in the consideration of a despair which might lead him to seek any support, even that of a wife as old as his mother, partly from the existence of a letter to the lady which, though enigmatical, displays an interesting mixture of wounded pride and real or pretended jealousy.

The epistle is dated June 18, 1795. He felt that she would think him duped, he explains, if he did not inform her that although she had not seen fit to give her confidence to him, he had all along known that she had Salicetti in hiding. Then follows an address to that countryman, evidently intended to clear the writer from all taint of Jacobinism, and couched in these terms: "I could have denounced thee, but did not, although it would have been but a just revenge so to do. Which has chosen the truer part? Go seek in peace an asylum where thou canst return to better thoughts of thy country. My lips shall never utter thy name. Repent, and, above all, appreciate my motives. This I deserve, for they are noble and generous."

In these words to the political refugee he employs the familiar republican "thou"; in the peroration, addressed, like the introduction, to the lady herself, he recurs to the polite and distant "you." "Madame Permon, my good wishes go with you as with your child. You are two feeble creatures with no defense. May Providence and the prayers of a friend be with you. Above all, be prudent, and never remain in the large cities. Adieu. Accept my friendly greetings."

The meaning of this missive is recondite; perhaps it is this: Mme. Permon, I loved you, and could have ruined the rival who is your protege with a clear conscience, for he once did me foul wrong, as he will acknowledge. But farewell. I bear you no grudge. Or else it may announce another change in the political weather, by the veering of the cock. As a good citizen, despising the horrors of the past, I could have denounced you, Salicetti. I did not, for I recalled old times and your helplessness, and wished to heap coals of fire on your head, that you might see the error of your way. The latter interpretation finds support in Buonaparte's quick and easy conversion from Jacobinsim which followed, and in his subsequent labored explanation that in the "Supper of Beaucaire" he had not identified himself with the Jacobin soldier, but had wished only by a dispassionate presentation of facts to show the hopeless case of Marseilles, and to prevent useless bloodshed.

DANGEROUS EXERCISES.

It takes a great deal of good judgment to manage athletics and exercises of all sorts. More people do themselves harm by going to extremes in matters of this kind than the world is willing to admit. The difficulty is that, half the time, the victims of foolishness do not know what the matter is with them until the harm is done, and frequently are unaware of the cause of their sufferings.

Physical culture has been lauded to the skies, and it is deemed impossible that there can be any wrong or harm in it. It is of the utmost importance that those who are beginning training of any sort should use the greatest care and deliberation in all that they do, and thus avoid injurious exercises and possible evil consequences that may never leave them.

It seems but a little thing if one strains a muscle, but such an accident has caused a lifetime of misery. Any exertion that causes a straining of the muscles should be avoided. This is admitted by everyone, but no one seems to take into consideration the fact that the very worst over-straining can come from one's favorite exercises or by means of a few simple movements that appear to involve but little tax on the strength. Not long ago a young woman applied to a physician for advice about a serious pain in her side. She had been suffering for some time, and it had increased in severity until it was almost incessant. It took some time for the doctor to get any clue to the cause of the trouble, but finally it developed that she had been in the habit of taking certain gymnastic exercises, with her hands on her hips, the fingers pressing forward over the sides. This at once furnished the key to the situation. The continual pressure of the finger-tips in front of the hip-bones had created an inflammation that became a rather difficult thing to handle, and so for months she had suffered, and merely because no one had seemed to discover that the constant pressing on a sensitive spot might do a great deal of harm.

PROFITS OF LITERATURE.

Just what a successful hit in literature means to an author in dollars and cents was demonstrated to me a few days since when I saw a check sent to Hall Caine for nearly $5,000 as royalties of the American sales of "The Manxman" during the last four months, says a writer in the Brooklyn Standard-Union. In the same manner over $10,000 has been sent to Stanley Weyman by his American publishers as royalties on his books during the last nine months. What has been thus far remitted to Mr. Du Maurier is not known, but it is close to accuracy to place his revenue from "Trilby" at $25,000. It was not an unusual thing for Robert Louis Stevenson to receive $15,000 a year from his literary work, and I remember very well, during the popularity of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" as a book and play, that Mrs. Burnett's yearly income exceeded $25,000. Mary Wilkins has netted over $5,000 from "Pembroke," while a close friend of S. R. Crockett tells me that his income last year from his writings was over $20,000.

Literary success is a very profitable thing, without a doubt. When once it is achieved the truth of the old maxim, that nothing succeeds like success, is very quickly demonstrated to the author. But only few reach the coveted goal. A novel, for example, must sell 5,000 copies before it pays its publisher and begins to show a profit to its author. And when one considers that not one out of forty novels ever reach a 5,000 sale the chances of success will be better understood.

LAMPS ON THE HARNESS.

Recent visitors to Germany, and Berlin in particular, have noticed the large number of coupes and open carriages which are lighted with electricity. Many of these carriages are drawn by horses which have electric lights fastened to their harness, either on the blinders or on some part of the collar. These lighting appliances are a specialty of a Berlin firm, which furnishes the fittings, lamps, reflectors, and storage batteries. These fittings are made of ebonite, and the wires which convey the current are insulated by rubber tubes, which are buried in the harness to protect them. The lamps are connected with the harness by flexible conducting cords. The lamps are lighted by a battery of accumulators of four or six cells contained in a small case, weighing forty or fifty pounds. Each element is contained in a hard rubber cell. No acid is used, a gelatinous mass being substituted. The case containing the cells may be placed under the seat of the carriage and is capable of supplying current for twenty ampere hours. The idea has suggested itself to the owners of four-in-hands to equip the coach and harness with fittings for the electric light. Lights were thus fixed in pairs on the collar of each horse. The Emperor of Germany has twenty hunting carriages provided with a lamp at the end of the pole. The storage batteries are easily charged before setting out.

THE WOMEN OF COREA

Description of the Costume of Corean Women.

SOFT, BLACK, ALMOND-SHAPED EYES.

When Pretty They are Very Pretty, When Ugly they are as Ugly as Sin.

"The costume of Corean women deserves to be described. They wear, it seems, huge padded trousers, similar to those of the men, their stockings also being padded with cotton wool. The latter are fastened tightly round the ankles to the trousers by means of a ribbon. It is not to be inferred, however, that the Corean lady walks about the streets attired in manly garments for over her trousers she wears a shortish skirt tied very high over the waist. Both trousers and skirt are generally white, and of silk or cotton, according to the social grade or means of those who wear them. A tiny jacket, usually white, red, or green, completes the attire of most Corean women, one peculiarity of which is that it is so low-necked that both breasts are left uncovered, a strange fashion when one considers that the climate of Corea is colder than that of Russia or even Canada. The hair, of which the women have no very great abundance, is very simply made up, plastered down flat with some sort of unpleasant smelling oil, parted in the middle, and tied into a knot at the back of the head. Whether a cap be worn or not, the Corean maiden covers her head and face with a long, green mantilla or hood, throwing it over the head and keeping it closed over the face with the left hand. It must not on this account be imagined that women in Cho-sen are less coquettish than they are elsewhere, for the good-looking ones, either pretending that the wind has blown back the hood or that the hand holding it over the face has slipped, take every opportunity of showing you how pretty they are. We are assured that when a Corean woman is pretty she is as pretty as they make them; on the other hand when she is otherwise she is as ugly as sin. The author bids us take, for example, a good-looking one, and note her sad little oval face, with arched eyebrows, and jet black, almond-shaped eyes, softened by long eyelashes. Her nose is straight, though it might to advantage be a little less flat, and she possesses a sweet little mouth, just showing two pretty teeth as white as snow. There seems to be so much dignity and repose about her movements that, when you first see her, you almost take her for a small statue. Hardly will she condescend to turn her face around or raise it up, and even less inclined is she to smile, such is her modesty; but, once her shyness has worn off, her face brightens and a soft, affectionate, distant look in her eyes is enough to mash the stronghest of mankind. She cannot, indeed, compare in attractiveness with a European beauty, for she is neither so tall nor so well developed, but the author deems her pre-eminent among the women of far Eastern nationalities. To his mind, the Japanese women of whom one hears so much, although more artistically clad, are not a patch upon the Venuses of Chosen. Strange to us seems the privilege accorded to women in Corea of walking the streets of towns after dark, while the men are strictly confiend to the house from above an hour after sunset, and, until lately, were severely punished, both with imprisonment and flogging, if found walking about the streets during women's hours. The gentler sex, on the other hand, is allowed to parade the streets and pay calls on their parents and friends until a very late hour in the night. For one reason or another, women are scarce in Corea and always in great demand. The coolies and people of a similar or lower grade cannot do without a female companion, for it is she who prepares the food, washes the clothes, and sews them up. She is beaten frequently, but, on the other hand, she often beats the man, for the Corean woman has a temper, and jealousy is one of her chief attributes. The author has seen women in Seoul nearly tearing one another to pieces, and he pronounces them consummate mistresses of the art of scratching. The men on such occasions stand around them, encouraging them to fight, the husbands enjoying the fun even more than the other spectators. On the whole the women of Cho-sen seem to get less enjoyment out of life than any other women in Asia.

HELPLESS THING!

Just as the papers say, there are a great many things a woman can't do—keep a secret, climb a tree, etc. Here are a few things a man can't do:

Take a pin by the head and put it into a cushion without pricking himself.

Light a fire in a kitchen range without burning himself before he is through.

Tie anybody's necktie but his own.

Hold a baby.

Open a hot boiled egg.

Carry more than one item of memoranda in his mind at a time.

Find anything that he looks for.

In the Wrong Office.—Caller—"We are very rich, and we wish to marry our daughter to a count, a marquis or a duke." Clerk (with dignity)—"You are in the wrong office. This is a matrimonial agency. You will find the international purchasing agency two doors to the left."—N. Y. Weekly.

What a mercy it is that the outrage and murder of those two young women in San Francisco did not occur in a Catholic church! What would the A. P. A. not have said and done had such been the case?

Japan is rapidly coming to the front as one of the foremost military powers of the world. The reluctance of European nation to interfere, single-handed, in the peace arrangements now being perfected in the Orient, is one proof of the wonderful progress made in the domain of the Mikado within the past twenty-five years.

Thirty years after the assassination of President Lincoln a new story is sprung on the world, detailing in an entirely new way how J. Wilkes Booth was not shot, and is now alive, while some other man, hitherto unheard of, received the fatal bullet. Such stories however, can hardly create a ripple of interest. Wilkes Booth is dead enough and execrated enough throughout the civilized world for all purposes, and no amount of fakes can bring him again to life.

Theodore Durrant is unable to understand the Rev. J. George Gibson's neglect to call upon him in his prison cell, as they had always been very close and intimate friends. But it is evident that the Rev. Gibson doesn't think it would be to his own interest to give him even the consolations of religion at the present crisis, lest something might occur to make it even more difficult than it is now to establish his own innocence. The bump of caution seems large on the Rev. Gibson's cranium.

An officer of rank and distinction in the United States Navy gives it as his honest opinion that the Monterey is the most formidable fighting machine afloat, and that she would simply play with the Royal Arthur were there to be a contest between the two vessels. The Monterey is not impervious to torpedo attacks, nor is any other ship afloat, but with her armor, her protected decks, her low free-board and her tremendous guns she could resist the attack of the most powerful war vessel afloat.

It is developing that the syndicate of bankers which took the last issue of bonds entered into a verbal agreement to keep the rate of foreign exchange at a price that would make it unprofitable for exporters of gold to draw gold out of the United States Treasury for shipment to Europe, and that the other bankers are now running the rates of exchange on London so low that the syndicate is rapidly loosing the money that it made on the deal. Yet the gold reserve remains about the same from week to week. The outcome will be awaited with considerable interest.

The Japanese have exacted an indemnity of 200,000,000 taels of silver from the Chinese, and this amount has been agreed upon by the Chinese Envoy in signing the articles of peace. This quantity of the white metal at the price ruling during the early part of the month would be the equivalent of $220,000,000 in gold, but it is hardly conceivable that the Chinese can procure silver at anything like the rate suggested, for a sudden demand would send up the price in a twinkling. There is every reason to believe that the Chinese would insist upon having the amount of the indemnity stated in terms of gold in order to protect themselves against a speculative rise in silver, but it is possible that the shrewd Japanese are not averse to doing a turn for themselves, and have therefore insisted upon being paid in the metal in use throughout Japan and China. Even had the Japanese demanded payment in gold the ultimate result would have been a heavy demand for silver, as the major part of the indemnity will be employed to extinguish the internal debt created by the war. As this debt is a silver debt the Japanese Government will certainly pay it off in that metal, therefore it is a safe assumption that any gold obtained would be speedily converted into silver.

The Coming Camp

The following letter was received this week and contains interesting information relative to the recent discovery at Gold Ridge, near Modock. This camp promises to develop into the richest and most valuable mineral belt in Inyo County.

MODOCK, April 20, 1895.

The south tunnel of the '95 mine shows 16 inches of ore in the face, 130 feet from the surface assaying $80 in gold and 94ozs silver per ton. The north tunnel of the Gold Ridge mine has six inches of ore averageing $94 in gold and 153 ozs silver per ton. Two hundred and nineteen sacks of ore from the last named mine were shipped to-day.

The Valentine mine owned by Fred Wallace, looks fine and 100 sacks of rich gold ore are ready for shipment.

The Muldoon mine, the property of Wm. Monahan, is looking and doing well, he having about forty sacks ready to ship. Both of these claims were located only about a month ago.

The Dick Turpin mine, owned by Ben T. Williams and W. Cameron, shows the richest ore on the surface of any mine at Gold Ridge, as the returns on assays made at Denver show $289, $179 and $153 in gold per ton. They will commence to open their claim this week.

Birthday Part.

The residence of Mr. and Mrs. C. A Walter was the scene of a very pleasant social gathering last Saturday evening. The occasion being the eighteenth anniversary of the birthday of their son, Master Carl Walter. At the appointed hour of eight o'clock the parlor was filled with the many friends of the family, and under the direction of Miss Lena Thompson the evening was delightfully spent with games and music, until the hour of twelve o'clock, when the guests repaired to the dining room, where an excellent supper had been spread. There were many wishes expressed for more such happy meetings. After which the guests returned to the parlor where a few more pleasant hours were spent until time to return home, when numerous congratulations were offered Mr. Carl Walter and his sister for the pleasant evening enjoyed.

Worlds Of Fruit

John Baxter says that he will have an unusually large crop of fruit this year. We visited his orchard yesterday and the trees are filled with set fruit. Apricot, peach and prune trees will be overladen, while apple and pear trees will bear more than an average crop. Mr. Baxter has about ten acres of orchard, part of it being young trees just coming into bearing. He has also an extensive apiary located in the orchard and expects to market about 12,000 pounds of honey this year. There being so many flowers and blossoms this season renders the pospects unusually good for a heavy honey crop.

A New Incorporation.

Articles of incorporation of the Rawson Ditch Company, were filed in the County Clerk's office last Wednesday. The capital stock is $40,000 divided into 4,000 shares, each of the par value of $10.

Subscribers	No. shares	Amount
C. B. Rawson	2,355	$23,550 00
R. W. Ford	780	7,800 00
T. F. A. Connelly	390	3,900 00
T. W. S. McLeod	100	1,000 00
G. P. Bourland	75	750 00

The sheep owners of the San Joaquin Valley will make a determined effort to escape the payment of the license tax in this county. Should they succeed in doing so it will mean a loss in revenue to the county of about five thousand dollars a year. It is said that the fight will be made on the ground that sheep migrating through one county to a destination in another county should not be taxed in the county travelled through, under a decision of the Supreme Court in a case carried up from El Dorado county.

G. W. Maxon bought about two hundred and fifty head of horses and mules in the valley and went south with them Wednesday. They were a nondescript lot, some being fair sized, useful animals, and a large number of small plugs. He is reported to have paid about $10,000 for the lot, and that amount of cash left in the valley will help matters considerably. The horse market west of the Mountains must be looking up.

LETTUCE FOR MARKET.

Packing Lettuce For Shipping to Distant Markets—Delivery to Home Markets.

A prominent grower of lettuce for market has the following to say concerning its packing and shipment in American Gardening: From our personal observation, and so far as we are able to learn from correspondence, we are of the opinion that the methods used in packing lettuce for shipping purposes are about the same in the different parts of the country.

If to be sent any distance, barrels are most commonly used as a package. During warm weather it becomes necessary to ventilate them, by means of holes cut or bored in the staves, but in the winter season, on the other hand, the barrels must be so prepared that frost will not be likely to enter. To effect this they are lined with newspapers or other paper, and if properly handled by the transportation companies there is seldom any loss.

The methods of packing properly necessarily differ with the kind of lettuce grown, whether upright growing sorts like the Grand Rapids, or flattened, cabbage kinds, of the Tennisball habit. Grand Rapids growers, for the most part, pack in tiers, with the leaves placed horizontally. From two to four heads are taken up at one time in the hand and placed in the barrel, and others are then put in so as to form rows running around it. Some shippers think it best to arrange it so that the stems will be covered by the leaves of the next bunches, while others place the butts upon the heads previously put in. If necessary, one or more heads are added to form a solid tier. Although it does not look as well when opened, the general opinion seems to be that the lettuce ships fully as well and can be taken out much better if the butts are placed upon and overlapping the heads, thus affording a handle by which they can be taken out. Layer after layer is put in in this way, until the barrel is full. Papers are then placed over the top of the barrel, and a cover of burlap is put on and held in place by means of a hoop.

For the cabbage sorts the barrel is prepared in the same way, and the lettuce is packed in tiers, with the butts up. It can be seen that these varieties with flattened heads cannot well be packed in any other way. With this exception, there is little, if any, difference in the methods of packing.

When the market is sufficiently near to admit of the delivery of the lettuce to the dealers by the grower, each consults his own convenience. Perhaps the most common packages are boxes about 3 by 8 by 1 foot in depth. These are so made that they will nest one above the other and fit closely in the wagon. Some growers prefer to use baskets for this purpose, however, and the flat so called market baskets answer well, although many use ordinary bushel baskets for well grown Grand Rapids and other tall kinds.

How to Breed Geese.

In a paper read before the Rhode Island Poultry association by William Rankin on "Breeding Geese For Profit," this advice was given on selection for the purpose of breeding: Take the variety you desire to breed, carefully select such as are strong, large, square, vigorous and healthy. See that they are well mated, three geese with one gander as a colony. Then give them a place affording as large liberty as you can, but locate them. Place as nests for their use some covered boxes about two feet square, putting in some fine cut straw and a nest egg in each nest. Have each goose lay in her own box. Then you have one colony fixed. Your next colony you will place at some remote distance and teach them to run together and separate from the others. You can breed as many colonies as you can accommodate, no matter if the ganders do come together once in awhile and have a little sparring match. Feed each colony near their nests, teach them that is their home and when there they are not to be molested.

Feed boiled cabbage, turnips or potatoes mixed with cornmeal. Give them all they will eat of this with a good feed of corn once a day. Keep ground oyster shells by them all the time. Keep an egg account with each goose, and mark the most productive layer as the one you want to preserve. With this method, after a few years you will secure for yourself a lot of first class egg producers. Should you happen to lose any of your flocks always replace from the best laying goose you have and get your ganders from the same class of goose.

Westphalia Hams.

The Westphalia hams are made as follows: Well rubbed with dry salt and left to drain 24 hours. Take 2 quarts of salt, 2 quarts of bag (rock) salt, 3 pounds of brown sugar, a pound saltpeter, 4 ounces sal pruelle and 4 ounces juniper berries, well mixed and boiled in 6 quarts of water. The brine is then cooled and skimmed. The hams are taken from the salt and wiped dry and the cold pickle poured over them and rubbed in. There should be enough brine to cover the meat. Turn the meat every second day for three weeks; then take them out, wipe dry, and a mixture of ground pepper, salt and bran is thoroughly rubbed in, filling all cracks and openings. They are then smoked a little every day for three months or more until completely dry, when they will keep and improve in flavor for years. Pyroligneous acid will keep off flies and animalculæ of all kinds and improve the flavor of the meat.

Thrashing Corn.

A Missouri correspondent of The Farm, Field and Fireside tells about thrashing corn with a thrashing machine and engine. He was well pleased with the result. The corn was run through the same as any other grain and the corn shelled. Where there is a considerable amount of fodder to handle, and especially where the farmer is situated so that the shelled grain can be ground in a feed grinder before feeding, the plan is a good one, saving considerable work in handling the fodder and putting the stover in a better condition to be eaten up clean by the stock. The work should be done reasonably early in the fall—as soon, in fact, as the corn is sufficiently dry to shell well and admit of storing away in considerable quantity.

CHEAPEST POULTRY RATION.

Cut Green Bone an Important Factor, Value of Animal Food.

Progressive poultry men recognise the advantage of feeding animal food of some kind to poultry. They also understand the value of cut bone in the feeding ration. Up to within a few years only dry bones were used in this way because of the difficulty in smashing green bones into suitable size for feeding. Since then machines have been put upon the market for cutting or slicing the green bones, and this has in many places almost revolutionized poultry feeding. A raw or green bone contains considerable meat and gristle, which, when cut up with the hard bone, make a very nitrogenous food which could hardly be utilized in any other way. By running it through one of these machines the bone is changed into a soft, pasty mass that may be fed alone or when mixed with grain or vegetables.

The cheapest poultry ration was the subject for correspondence in the columns of The Rural New Yorker recently, and in nearly every instance cut bone was one of the ingredients specified.

A New York correspondent said that he fed his poultry fresh cut raw bone, oats, cornmeal, wheat bran and middlings, whole wheat, corn in ear and buckwheat varied for a change. The cheapest ration is oats in the bundle cut fine with a straw cutter for winter feed. In summer let them go to grass.

James Rankin wrote: The main feed to my hens when confined in winter is wheat bran, mixed with cut clover, green rye and boiled turnips, one-third green stuff and two-thirds bran, with a little animal meal or beef scrap mixed in. I give all they will eat of this in the morning and at night corn, wheat and oats, keeping them a trifle hungry.

A Pennsylvanian who devotes his time and attention to duck raising said: Green bone is an economical feed. Having fed about 20 tons this season places us in a position to know its merits. We mix it with other feed. Fifteen per cent ground bone is about right for ducks, young and old; also for hens and broilers. Green bone costs 50 cents per 100 pounds at the slaughter house. Raising ducks is our main business. The feed should consist of 15 per cent green bone, 20 per cent bran, 20 per cent No. 2 flour, 15 per cent crackers, 30 per cent cornmeal. To this should be added green food of some kind, such as corn, rye, etc., or clover hay cut fine and steamed for some time in quantities equal to the ration first given.

Competition In Wheat Growing.

Eastern wheatgrowers often speak of "western competition" and the difficulty of competing with the rich, fertile lands of the slope from the Rockies to the Mississippi. We hear little said out west about "eastern competition," and yet Rural New Yorker thinks that that is quite a serious thing. If the old farms east of Indiana were now producing simply the wheat that could be grown on the natural soil, there would be little surplus, and grain growing in the far west would be profitable. In other words, if there were no fertilizers to be had besides barnyard manure, green crops and wood ashes, there would be but few grainfields from Maine to the Alleghanies. The wheatgrower of the far west has a strong competitor in the fertilizer bag, which has enabled sections like the Genesee valley, in New York state, to produce more wheat on fewer acres than when the land was new.

Wholesale Vaccination.

A few weeks ago the sultan of Turkey had his wives vaccinated. As no female doctor had yet found her way to the Bosporus there was nothing for it but to admit a medical man to the apartments of the imperial ladies. The devotees of Mohammed need be under no apprehension. The laws of the prophet were not transgressed, nor were the odalisks exposed to the gaze of any other man except their august lord and master. A partition was erected in a room of the palace in which a hole was cut out. Through this hole 167 of the most beautiful arms in the world were thrust forth in succession. There were arms of snowy white and ebony black—in short, arms to suit all tastes—but the doctor, an Italian named Muracci, saw nothing beyond these arms.

The operation was effected in the presence of a crowd of eunuchs, including Manour Ali and Dsely Mar. The latter is a stalwart Abyssinian, who covered the head of the doctor with a black cloth at every change of the arms. Later advices from Constantinople inform us that 12 of the prettiest young ladies have suddenly died from blood poisoning consequent on the above operation.—Neue Freie Presse.

Heart Failure No Longer Accepted.

The registration and sanitary committee of the board of health has addressed the following notice to the physicians of the city:

"As the board of health is doing all in its power to prevent the spread of contagious diseases, you are requested not to place on any certificate 'heart failure' as the cause of death, but the disease of which the patient was suffering prior to the heart failure. This term has never been placed on the list of diseases adopted by this board, it being looked upon as a result of some other illness from which the patient was suffering. Furthermore, it furnishes an opportunity to conceal contagious diseases, and thus permits the ignoring of the rules of this board by the family and undertaker, either innocently or designedly.

"Hereafter a burial permit will not be issued on the certificate of death of 'heart failure' when unaccompanied with the disease from which the heart failure occurred."—Philadelphia Times.

Anxious to Break Gladstone's Heart.

Lord Randolph Churchill, speaking at Leicester on Wednesday, revived the history of the three conspicuous Irishmen who had broken their hearts over the repeal of the union, or something equivalent to it—O'Connell, Butt and Parnell. Now Mr. Gladstone is engaged in the same enterprise and will experience just the same fate. Great Britain will soon have an opportunity of showing its determination not to allow this empire to be disintegrated to please "the civilized world" or the powers who grudge England her prosperity and would gladly see her weakened by her own folly in taking a step backward into division, when all other states are taking steps to attain a stronger unity and a completer organization. Lord Randolph evidently expects an early dissolution.—London Spectator.

Stanford's Two Palm Trees.

Mr. Stanford was not superstitious, but he believed that his life was linked with that of two palm trees which he had planted in front of his Palo Alto home. He bestowed great care on these trees, and they flourished until a few weeks before his death, when their leaves began to turn yellow. No one noticed this change until one evening the senator called the attention of one of his closest friends to the trees and said he regarded this as a bad omen. He said solemnly, "When those trees die, my life will end." The palm trees are now dead, and Stanford lies lifeless in the shadow of their withered tops.—New York Tribune.

An Affectionate Mother.

"The most affectionate mother I ever knew," said Colonel Goslington, "and I believe all mothers are affectionate, is the wife of my young nephew, Claude Goslington. When their young child was sick, its mother took its medicine for it. It was some sort of bitter medicine, and when it came time to take it the child said: 'I can't take that. It's nasty!' 'Well, oo needn't take it, Regie. Mamma will take it for oo.' And she did, and thereafter at the appointed time she took Regie's medicine for him regularly. Regie got well, notwithstanding that he didn't get the medicine, but what child could stay long sick with such a mother as that?"

Where Ignorance Is Really Bliss.

A correspondent from China writes: "I asked an innkeeper in the town of Kotan-Tish if he knew what country it was that had dared to go to war against China, and he dreamily replied that it was a foreign country somewhere near England. As a matter of fact, there are thousands of interior towns and villages whose people may never hear of the existing troubles until some years hence, when some itinerant missionary may speak of the war in conversation."

LOVE IN A BARREL

By HOWARD PYLE.

The young officer reined back his horse to where the troopers were plodding behind, and a few words passed between them. "Very well," said he, riding forward to the cart again, "we'll stop for fifteen minutes, if it won't take you any longer."

Mattie's heart began to beat as though to smother her; she felt her eyes grow misty with tears. "Very well," said she, after awhile, when she could trust herself to speak, "just as you choose."

How Mattie ever got the soldiers into the kitchen of the farm house and her cousin into the back entry without the good old dame betraying her she never could tell.

Perhaps it was because Friend Penny was nearsighted; perhaps it was because she was bewildered by the coming of the soldiers that she did not recognize Mattie at first.

And now at last Mattie had her in the entry back of the dining room.

"Cousin Mary," said she, "don't say anything—don't make a noise—I am Mattie—hush!"

"Mattie! ! ! !" cried the old lady. The girl clapped her hand over her mouth. "Hush!" she said again. "Don't make a noise—I can't stay—I must go back to the kitchen—there's a man in the barrel in the cart—send some hard cider to the kitchen right away and then get him out—I've told them that I was to stop for a letter—make believe to write one."

All this she said pantingly and brokenly, and then she was gone.

"Where's the mulled cider?" said the young lieutenant.

"It's coming," said Mattie. "I told the old lady to fetch it right away."

The corporal had lit his pipe, and was standing looking out of the window, streaked and blurred with rain. "Hallo!" he cried suddenly. "Hi, there! Stop! What's that man doing with the horse and cart?"

Mattie looked out of the window and saw John Grimes, the hired man, leading the horse and cart toward the shed behind the house. "Oh! he's only going to take the horse out of the rain," she said; "let him alone. Here comes the cider."

Friend Penny brought it in with trembling hands and set it down upon the table. "Now, ma'am," said Mattie, "you go and fetch me the iron. I'll sizzle the cider up. Oh, I am a master hand at making cider!" she rattled on; "I'll show you how to brew a mull of cider that'll make your wig stand on end. Many and many a glass I have brewed for old Joey Sparks, and it had to be just so or he'd leather me." She hardly knew what she was saying, but she chattel wildly on as she heated the iron in the fire, dipping it into the cider until it steamed again, sweetening the fragrant brown liquor with sugar and spicing it with cloves and allspice. "Now, then, taste that, captain," she said, handing it to the young officer with a flourish.

She heard a sound of shuffling feet without, as though of men carrying a heavy weight, and then a thump as though of that burden set upon the floor.

"What is that?" said the lieutenant, stopping his hand as he raised the cup to his lips.

"I don't know," said Mattie. "Nothing, I guess. Did you know that this house was haunted?"

"No, of course I didn't. How should I know it?"

"True for you, captain! Of course you didn't know it was haunted; but it is, and I'll tell you the story if you'd like to hear it." Without waiting for an answer she rattled on, partly improvising a string of nonsense, partly adhering to the thread of an old legend of the neighborhood—a story of a murdered peddler, and of how every year at the same hour that the murder was done all the sounds of the tragedy were enacted over again. She was telling of how a woman passing through the kitchen had seen the peddler at the table when her cousin came into the room with the bogus letter in her hand. Mattie read in her eyes that the work was done, and therewith the story came to an abrupt end. She put her hand to her throat. Then "I forget the rest of the story!" she cried wildly.

The young officer looked keenly at her.

"You're drunk!" said he.

"No, I ain't," said Mattie, in a shrill voice. "I am as sober as you are."

"Is he safe?" she whispered as she passed her cousin in the entry.

"Yes," said Jane Penny in an answering whisper; and then, "Don't give way, Mattie."

"Don't speak to me!" gasped the poor girl.

"Halloo!" said the corporal when they came out into the rain, "they've stood the barrel on end!"

And so they had, but it was not the same barrel that Mattie had brought with her from the Brandywine mills. She saw that at a flash, and then remembered that her uncle had sent a double barrel one time to Friend Penny to pack smoked hams in for the winter.

That long, dreadful ride to Chester always remained in her memory like some horrid nightmare. She had a dim recollection of staring straight before her, of what seemed to her the unending road, the fine rain dashing in her face and a bitter tightness in her throat. But at last it was ended, and she lay upon the bed in her aunt's spare room sobbing and crying as though her heart would break.

Perhaps no woman before or since that time has carried her lover in a flour barrel and then exchanged him for smoked hams.

* * * * * *

Major Van Cleiff made every effort to find the name and address of the old captain of troopers that suffered Mattie to pass along the road that day, but it was not until he had been married a twelvemonth that he was successful. Then he sent him on behalf of his wife a gold snuffbox set with diamonds. It was in the shape of half a miniature flour barrel.—Northwestern Miller.

Valentines and Eggs.

Louise, aged three, was anxious to follow her elders' example in making valentines. Here is her first effort: "Glory angels! How the wind blows about—blows about in the dark shed! There stood a little bird laying his eggs."

Her cousin, the same age, was very fond of boiled eggs. One day the waiters brought them to him poached instead. He would not have them, but insisted, "I want yat egg in yat place where it lives."—New York Tribune.
